Railroad Spur to County Oil Heating Plant Held Up By Red Tape—Engineer Aghast.

Complete Program Given Out By Celebration Committee — Fireworks and Dance Features.

Progress and the road oiling program of Jackson county is still impeded by the inability of anybody this side of New York City to move a Postal Telegraph Co. pole, situated in the geometrical center of a spur the Southern Pacific railroad is building to the heating plant of the county oiling station. As a result, County Engineer Paul Rynning is unable to spread hot oil on the Itch highway and the Sams Valley highway.

No county official dreamed that the uprooting of the telegraph pole would be such a herculean task. So as a matter of courtesy, they requested the right to move the pole. Thereupon, the county discovered that telegraph poles are not shunted around like a deck chair, and are wrapped around with miles of red tape.

The Southern Pacific company built the spur down to the pole, and stopped abruptly, and that mighty corporation has apparently left the same snag as the county. It seems that telegraph poles are erected on established rights of way, and are forever thereafter forbidden to be moved therefrom, in accordance with custom, tradition and fine points, the layman never hears about. It also appears a right of way for the wires across the Richfield Oil company is also involved, and further complicates the situation. It is hoped that the tangle will be untangled in time to oil the roads before winter sets in.

No question of such outstanding magnitude has confronted County Engineer Paul Rynning during his tenure of office, and his calm has been upset, causing him to say "Doo-gone it!" frequently.
