PEAR GROWERS URGE HOLDING FOR HIGH PRICE

While both local growers and local buyers of fruit agree that the canneries prices fixed in California on Monday were higher than expected, and justify optimism regarding the profits of pears in southern Oregon this year, the growers as usual, believe the prevailing prices will be higher than do the buyers.

"This condition is always true. The growers naturally want to get all they can for their fruit, and the buyers don't want to pay any more than they have to."

Several pear growers, visited the Mail Tribune today, and asked that their views be published, but none of them were willing to be quoted, declaring they did not want to get mixed up in any controversy.

The consensus among the growers seems to be that local orchardists should not be eager to sell to canneries at any price less than $40 per ton, that canneries should pay a premium for local pears—have often done so in the past and will do so this year—and that with green Bartlett's now bringing over $50 a ton in the east, the growers of the highest grade fruit here should get approximately this price.

As one well known grower expressed it: "The buyers are trying to bear the market, and unless the true facts are known many orchardists may sacrifice their product needlessly. I maintain it costs $40 an acre to raise Bartlett's. No pears should be sold at less, and I predict the average price will be close to $50."
