A FINCE GIRL COMES TO TOWN

our complexion's sake, you know." Tony laughed. "I see you haven't lost the old spirit, Mary Lou." They had arrived at Jay's studio, and Tony came in with her. Jay and Jerry had excused themselves tactfully at the field. "If they only knew," Mary Lou thought to herself. "If they only knew the news that must greet them when they get home!" Tony himself couldn't understand his feelings toward Mary Lou. Before the fight, he had regarded her as a bright girl, perhaps the nicest of all the girls he knew.

Chapter 25 TONY RETURNS MARY LOU saw Brynmor frequently during the next several weeks. It became genuinely pleasant to talk with him of things that she preferred not to discuss with Jay. Before she realized it, Tony was almost due to return. One day he cabled her from New York that he hoped to be in London within a week.

It was late on a May afternoon when Gay Girl, like a huge silver homing pigeon, appeared through the clouds above Crocyden field. Great crowds had surged there to welcome Tony home. Praise of his accomplishment was on everyone's lips. Mary Lou shared his glory too, as "the girl to whom Tony Tiberington is engaged." She tried to feign an appearance of happiness, but it was not sincere. It was with a mingled feeling of fear and suspense that she went to Crocyden to greet him—fear that the time had come when their game of "let's pretend" would end, and suspense because—well, when would it end?

Jay and Jerry stood with her in the front line of the crowd as Gay Girl swooped down and came to rest not 20 feet from them. "Run up and meet him, Mary Lou," Jay shouted. "Don't stand there like a stick." There was Tony, leaning from the cockpit, grinning his lopsided grin, shaking hands with the field officials. But Mary Lou couldn't move. Tony, at the moment, seemed like a stranger—a lean, bronzed, adorable stranger whom she happened, in some inexplicable way, to love.

She felt a horrible sense of embarrassment. Could this be the same Tony who had taken her to visit his aunt and begged her to become engaged to him to make this trip possible? As she stood there, tongue-tied and glued in her footsteps, Tony suddenly saw her. "Mary Lou!" he called, and pushed his way through the mob toward her. A moment later he was gripping her hands, grinning down at her. "Joy, Mary Lou, it is great to see you!" Awkwardly he bent down and kissed her. A score of press cameras clicked as one. Tomorrow the whole world would see their picture under the caption, "Daredevil Flier Greets Fiancée." Mary Lou blushed. "It's great to see you, too."

It was a stupid, obvious thing to say, but her head was in such a whirl that she could think of nothing else. "You're thinner, Tony," she gasped, as they made their way to a car. Tony winked. "Prickly pears," he grinned. "They're marvelous delectables." Tony was acting more like himself, yet instinctively she sensed that this Tony was different from the boy she had known before. He looked much the same, except that he was thinner and bronzed by the wind; he had the same mocking blue eyes and the same bantering smile. Perhaps the difference was in his mouth, it was more stern.

Yet the change was more intangible than that. She felt that the boy Tony was gone. This was a man. She didn't know whether to be glad or sorry. After all, did it matter—since she was to lose him so soon anyway? Intently she watched his profile as he talked of the flight, of the day he had stopped in Paris on his return. Tony was changed, to be sure, yet Mary Lou felt a possessing longing sweep over her. She wanted Tony—for herself. Her fingers itched for the feel of his hair; she wanted to kiss the cleft in his chin; she wanted to have him close beside her. She shut her eyes in agony. Tony continued talking cheerfully but unemotionally—always of Gay Girl. "I had a great time in New York, Mary Lou," he said. "There's plenty of dast and daring to those American girls. I fell in love with the lot of them."

"Did you?" Mary Lou knew she hated all American girls. "You look tired," he commented. "You mean I'm not looking pretty," she countered. "We can't all spend our lives jorjoring for will be by the pastor, W. H. Eaton, who will speak on "Troubled Hearts and What to Do With Them."
