"The First Pot of Tea"

A BIT OF TEA HISTORY

The first discovery of the virtue of the beverage obtained by infusing the tea-leaf in water is hidden in the obscurity of ancient history.

One of the most authentic records attributes its discovery about 2737 B. C. to Chin-nung, a celebrated scholar and philosopher, to whom nearly all agricultural and medical knowledge is traced in China. In replenishing a fire made of the branches of the tea-plant, some of the leaves fell into the vessel in which he was boiling water for his evening meal. The consumption of the beverage thus formed—"the first pot of tea,"—proved so exhilarating in effect that he formed the habit of using the leaves. Later, he imparted to others the knowledge thus accidentally gained, and in a short time it became the common property of the empire.

China is generally acknowledged as the birthplace of the tea industry. It was brought to England in 1657 and to the American colonies in 1680. The price at this time, even for the cheapest qualities, was from five to six dollars a pound.
