Below is a poem written by one of the "gyppos" of 1924, but, as it has never been published it will be of interest to many, especially those who work in the woods:

Fillings From the Saw Tooth Mrs. Found tacked on the door— In Nineteen Hundred and twenty four.

In Patton's camp, by Stanley's field, Surrounded by the tall uncut, An island in a sea of trees, We are bottled up like old King Tut.

By steady and persistent means, We decked a million feet to dry, For four long months we struggled here, And let the world go by.

The prohibition agents fought And bled at Brandywine— But the battle here, of the wilderness, Was won with hook and line.

I yet recall those little firs, And tangled maze of vines, As half in jest, and half in truth, I pen these wondering lines.

Those tall and stately yellow pines That nurtured by the season's tears, Have whispered to the forest life How many rings of years? The Gyppos cut them down at will.

And hatched them where they lay, The limbs were most all underneath, And there they let them stay, Nor did they swing with practiced eye.

Their axe to cut a vine, But said that all this brush shall fall, By other axe than mine.

But now the work is all complete, The trucks are silent, and we breathe no more, The clouds of dust that rose and fell, Around the kitchen door.

How many joys and sorrows blend, What thoughts are trusted to the lips that fall, How many are the night have been, Along life's journey's trail.

Like ships that cross each other's path— Or drift together 'round some friendly shoal, To seek again a chartered course, Or strive to reach some destined goal.

Our lives have touched in passing by— The future beckons, but who will foretell? Just grasp the hand of fellowship, And bid each other all farewell.

With apologies— JOHN BYRNE, Sept., 1924.
