

WILD BEAUTY

by MATEEL HOWE FARNHAM

SYNOPSIS: David Frost's walk softly, instead of standing up like a man and lambasting the life out of the old dragoon.

"Bob, I won't have you sneering at David. He's doing the best he can to meet an extremely difficult situation. It's not so easy to lambaste the life out of one's own mother—and it would only make things worse if he did."

"You're right. Who am I to sneer at David? I beg your pardon, Fanny, but it makes me so damned mad—and I so powerless to help you! Did you ever try telling her to mind her own business?"

"More or less. But she always makes me pay for it."

"How, for instance?"

"Oh, by black looks, and a frosty silence and a general air of being terribly abused and put upon. Sometimes she hardly speaks to me for days and days."

"Bob swore savagely under his breath."

"I'm not much good," Fanny went on wearily. "I haven't the strength to fight for what I think right or the character to make the best of my weakness. A year ago you would have been appalled if you could have seen how black my heart was. Now I haven't even the energy for a good active hatred."

"They walked down the hill almost in silence. When they came to the edge of a little covert, and Fanny saw that Bob was going to kiss her, she drew back."

"Please, Bob," she pleaded. "I can't see you again unless you are going to be wise for both of us. It's been such a comfort to talk to you—you've helped me so tremendously."

"Helped you," Bob spat the words at her, and strode ahead down the hill, barely speaking even at parting. It was almost 6 and Fanny lingered at the gate until David came, and went in with him.

Mrs. Frost was in the library reading the evening paper.

"Mrs. Greenough was here this afternoon," she accused. "She was very much disappointed not to see you."

"It was much too fine for Fanny to stay indoors," said David impatiently. "Anyway, Mrs. Greenough came to see you, not Fanny."

"Mrs. Greenough is partial to young people. She made a special point of asking if Fanny would be here when she telephoned. Fanny assured me that she would be."

"Bob meant to be, but Bob asked me to go walking and—"

"Bob Daniels."

The lesser offense was immediately forgotten in the greater.

"Have you heard David, what Bob is doing now to spite not only Lella but Lella's family?"

"Yes, Mother, and I think the less fuss made over it the better. He'll tire of it soon enough, unless we encourage him by raising a big potter. That's what he's hoping for."

"Perhaps," said Mrs. Frost majestically, "but I think you will agree that the least Lella's family can do to show their loyalty in her trouble and distress is to stand back of her, and ignore the man who is doing everything in his power to humiliate her and make her unhappy. If Emmeline finds out that Fanny has been walking with Bob, I doubt whether she will ever enter this house again. We have been intimates for 60 years, but I cannot say that I should blame her."

"Nonsense, Mother. As long as Lella and Bob are living together and he does nothing more violently wicked than running his father's store it would be idiotic to cut him."

"Very well. But I give warning that I mean to show him the door if he comes here. Lella, poor child, is almost prostrated."

David had vented the wrath temporarily from her, but Fanny knew that she would never be able to see Bob again without paying for it. Nevertheless Fanny meant to continue seeing Bob Daniels. He was her friend, her loyal and devoted friend, and he and she had need of friends just now. It was possible that she could be of service to Bob, and with his help she might win back a measure of her lost courage, build up again her necessary sense of proportion.

Tomorrow, in the 24th life of past-war days, Fanny finds release from her mother-in-law's domination.

LOYALTIES

BOB'S passionate plea took Fanny by surprise.

"Dear, dear, Bob! You are too absurd. Who am I but Fanny the nobody—condemned to be by all the best people? And besides—what gifts have I?"

Bob sat up, facing her. His voice and his gaze were a caress.

"Leaving out your beauty," he said, "and your—well, we'll call it your personality—you have the gift of high spirits and gaiety, the gift of gentleness and sweetness; a genuine liking for people and the sensitiveness and tenderness to draw them out; above all, the gift to hearten a man and make him think well of himself."

"I couldn't do it now. You've painted a glorified picture of the old Fanny. I'm not gay any more. Ask David."

"You were going to tell me about it. I suppose it's that mother-in-law of yours. Why in God's name did David take you back there to live?"

"It was my fault, not David's," Fanny began. She wanted in justice to David to tell Bob how her careless ignorance—and worse—had broken up his Seattle plans, but the memory was too bitter.

"I was so deeply to blame," she went on after a pause, "that I find I can't talk about it. You probably have heard. If you haven't, Lella will tell you."

Lella had written Bob at the time—Bob remembered now.

"All right," Bob's voice was barely with pity.

"David is caught in a trap," Fanny went on in an even tone. "He made a solemn promise to live with his mother as long as his uncle lived. About a year ago I begged him to take me away. I told him I couldn't be happy there—that it was stifling me, depriving me up inside. And he promised to have it out with Uncle Judd. But Uncle Judd was ill—and David kept putting it off. Then Uncle Judd had his stroke. The doctors say he may live 30 years. And David feels bound to keep his promise—now that he can't get to be released."

"In other words, he sacrifices you to satisfy his sensitive conscience. I suppose he calls it his honor. Admires himself."

"Don't! Don't begin sympathizing. I can't bear it." At the break in her voice Fanny found herself swept into Bob's arms and weeping comfortably on his two shoulders.

"There, that's done me worlds of good," said Fanny. Gently she released herself, patted Bob's head, managed a smile. "I haven't had anyone to talk to or anyone to feel sorry for me since you and Amelia went away—except Leona, our cook."

"I'll write Amelia," said Bob grimly, "and I think I'll also take it upon myself to tell David a thing or two—that is, if you're determined not to go with me."

Fanny shook her head.

"Don't be idiotic, Bob. You mustn't say anything to David—I'd never forgive you. He has the world on his shoulders now, poor boy. He isn't 20 yet, and he's practically running that bank. It's an enormous responsibility, and you know how conscientious he is, and how he worries."

"It might do him good to worry about you for a change—take you a little to heart," interrupted Bob viciously.

"Oh, but he does—he's always worrying about me. Naturally I don't run to him with constant complaints of his mother—it would drive him crazy."

"You poor kid! And of course the old girl knows that you'll keep your mouth shut and David will

Suffered Seven Months from Blood Poison—Cured in Two Weeks

Dec. 17, 1930.

To Whom It May Concern: I suffered for seven months with Blood Poisoning which made a terrible itching over my entire body. Then I went and consulted Chan and Kong, Herb Specialists and in two weeks time I was completely cured and I wish to recommend Chan and Kong to all persons who are sick.

Very truly yours,

Liver Trouble at Age of 75

Oakland, California, Feb. 15, 1930.

Dear Chan and Kong: To begin with, I am seventy-five years old. For several years past, I have felt more like a dead man than one with any desire for life. My liver and stomach appeared to be the seat of my trouble, as I was badly constipated, with little or no appetite, and my breath was so vilely bad that no one willingly stood near to converse with me.

To one doctor after another I went in search of relief but for the most part, beyond drastic purgatives and headache powders, none of them really got at the seat of my ailment and brought me any permanent relief.

Then, five months ago, I began your treatment which has been continued faithfully until today when I find myself feeling like a young man, thoroughly cured with an excellent appetite, a clean breath, perfect sleep and every suggestion of dizziness gone. Certainly I am more than glad to give you my heartiest endorsement.

Yours truly,
WILLIAM GILL,

Heart Trouble and Dizziness

Oakland, January 27, 1930.

Dear Chan and Kong: I welcome the opportunity to express my appreciation of and my gratitude for the herb treatment which I received from you through a period of six weeks.

I now found myself apparently completely restored to health, a condition to which I have been a stranger for a very long time. Mainly, my trouble was diagnosed as heart trouble and in connection with that I was subject to frequent spells of dizziness, was very nervous and without ambition to work or to do anything worth while.

My appetite deserted me and I lost quite steadily in weight, therefore, when you had been strongly recommended to me I decided on giving the herbs a trial, which resulted as I have stated, greatly to my satisfaction.

You are at liberty to refer to me at any time and I assure you of my heartiest endorsement.

Yours very truly,

Dear Chan and Kong: I welcome the opportunity to express my appreciation of and my gratitude for the herb treatment which I received from you through a period of six weeks.

I now found myself apparently completely restored to health, a condition to which I have been a stranger for a very long time. Mainly, my trouble was diagnosed as heart trouble and in connection with that I was subject to frequent spells of dizziness, was very nervous and without ambition to work or to do anything worth while.

My appetite deserted me and I lost quite steadily in weight, therefore, when you had been strongly recommended to me I decided on giving the herbs a trial, which resulted as I have stated, greatly to my satisfaction.

You are at liberty to refer to me at any time and I assure you of my heartiest endorsement.

Yours very truly,
