he had not recorded an Impression of Vivienne.

The artist's deft fingers had been busy with his clay. Now he critically examined the dainty eight-inch figure he had begun to fashion. Giancing up at his model, his ex-pression registered artistic satisfaction. Her coloring was gorgeous in its striking contrast. The blue-black cap of her hair was as sleek as though it had been lacquered. A vivid gash of crimson revealed a half-smile or her lips as mocking as the mystery in the depths of her half-closed eyes.

Putting down Channing's lighter Vivienne exhaled a cloud of smoke. Her arm dropped careleasily to her side and a bluish haze filtered up through her long, slender fugers, "Well, that's a relief." she an-nounced with a sigh. "Some day you'll "selp me here so long that I'll never move again."

Channing threw a wet cloth over his embryo statue. "How about a bit of luncheon?"

"They're the sweetest words I've ever heard!" Vivienne drew a shawl about her, a magnificent Spanish specimen of rose-embrol, lered black. Through the closed class doors she glimpsed the vista if terrace. "Can't we be served out there?" she asked. "I'd like to bathe in the fountain." "TH confess I'd like to let you." There?"

Channing helped her from the dais. "But as an artist. I insist that you don't catch cold. I mustu't forget my murals."

Then I'll curb my merms dencies," Vivienne promised him. "But I'm going to have lunch in the garden-oven if I have to dress. I suppose 1 might as well, anyway, We're not working this afternoon?" "No-but if you're comfortable. why bother to change just now !" "I shan't," she decided and sauntered out, carefully protecting he shouldors from the noon-day sun.
