Masked Longing

BY HOWARD ROCKEY — A ROMANCE OF RADIO

SYNOPSIS: Vivienne Grey, beautiful young artist's model, is jealous of the rise of her elder sister Aileen to stardom in a new Broadway musical comedy "Sara's Christmas Stocking." Aileen meanwhile is trying to forget her love for Jimmy Crane theatrical press agent, believing she must first make sure of Vivienne's future. Dwight Channing prominent artist, to whom Vivienne is posing, gives a party at his penthouse to celebrate Aileen's success in her new show. Vivienne, incensed at having to play second fiddle to her sister recklessly takes a dare to bathe in the fountain. When Aileen tries to stop her Vivienne slams the glass doors upon her and Aileen crashes through the glass. Her face is badly cut.

Chapter 13

ENTER THE MASK

JIMMY'S prophecy had been correct.

Now in its second month, "Sara's Christmas Stocking" was sold out for weeks ahead. Jimmy was being kept busy, arranging interviews with its piquant star. But that star was Fay Grant.

If New York recalled that Fay was not the original Miss Santa, it had at least forgotten who her predecessor was—"that what's her name who opened in it and then was hurt or something?"

Aileen was off the boards.

She was not off temporarily, as Max Klein had hoped. Now that she was out of the hospital, there was no doubt whatever about the situation. Aileen was disfigured for life. Not just scars that time would heal—she was hideously marred. She had not been robbed of her talent and her personality, but with her beauty had vanished the dream of the certain success that had seemed to her just around the corner.

Yet to Jimmy she was more beautiful, more desirable than ever. It was not pity, he told himself. It was more than admiration. Jimmy was only waiting for the propitious moment to tell her how much he loved her. Aileen knew that and dreaded it. Jimmy saw only her spirit, her bravery and resignation. He had never seen what Aileen saw when she looked into her mirror.

That was why she had left the hospital wearing a silk domino mask. Below it, the point of her dimpled chin and the soft curve of her lips were as bewitching as ever. There was not even the tiniest mark on the clear skin it left exposed. Through the slits of the mask her bright eyes peeped, sometimes deeply thoughtful, always fascinating.

Yet because of what was hidden, Aileen's sensitive nature prompted her to refuse to permit anyone but Jimmy to come to the apartment. Naturally, Klein had wanted to, Channing and a host of her friends, as well as those whose motive was curiosity. Even Fay Grant had wished to call—and her object was sincere—but Aileen had felt that meeting her would be more than she could bear.

Aileen had handled her first frank talk with Vivienne without a vestige of reproach; with an expression of buoyant hope that she, herself did not possess. Yet she made it sound convincing. There was still some money in the bank. If Vivienne could manage to bear the burden of expense for just a little while, Aileen felt she would be able to figure some solution of her own predicament. There must be so many things she could do, when she became adjusted to this new condition.

There had, of course, been criticism, not of her but of Vivienne. That only made matters worse. Conscience-stricken, Vivienne not only blamed herself bitterly, but felt that those who knew the truth held her in contempt. Because of this it was fortunate that her present work for Channing kept her in employment, without the need of making the rounds of the studios. But that would not last forever. Hence Aileen felt that she owed it to Viv not to fail her now.

Jimmy arrived one day with his usual cheery greeting.

"What's that?" Aileen asked as he opened up a square leather case.

"A marvelous invention," he said "A machine for making money—without getting pinched for it. Just in case you never saw one, it's a portable writing engine. You tick the keys and it writes little words on a sheet of paper. A lot of those sheets make up a play. To stand any chance of production, a play must first be read. Managers won't consider one unless it's neatly typed. Hence agents pay real money for copying manuscripts. Do you get my drift, old dear?"

"Oh, Jimmy!" Aileen was eager "Could I get copying to do—?"

"You can fire when ready," he told her. "I've brought you a pair of scripts. As soon as your fingers get nimbled up, you can run them off in no time—and I can bring you plenty. You can make six copies easily. When they're typed and bound, you can bill the hopeful author about twenty bucks."

There were tears behind the slits of the mask, but they were happy tears. Here was not only a source of income, but something to keep her occupied during her lonely hours. Aileen was supremely grateful. "How long should it take me to do one? I've never had any practice."

"A day or two when you get the knack—and that won't take long. Sit down and I'll give you a lesson."

Delighted, she did as he told her, and Jimmy began explaining. "First, you pick out a sentence and type it over and over, as rapidly as you can. That teaches you the keyboard. For instance, look at this." With practiced speed he produced a line. . . .

I'm in love with the loveliest girl a lover ever loved.

He paused and looked up at her. "You see it's perfectly simple, once you get the hang of it. Now let me watch you try it."

Aileen did, and both of them laughed. He put his hands on hers and guided them, and something a little more nearly correct appeared on the white sheet. But the warmth of his touch made her forget what she was trying to do. Jimmy's face was close to hers and his cheek was brushing her mask. With a feeling of panic she sprang up and clutched madly at the ribbon which held the domino.

"I'm sorry," he said. "You'll get it all right—when you try it by yourself." He knew what had frightened her, and he was perfectly well aware of something that would not do. He knew that he would have kissed her in another moment. So he pulled out a pack of cigarettes and passed one to Aileen. Neither of them said a word as she puffed at it.

Jimmy tried not to seem concerned, but he felt a strange sensation as he watched her smoke. That mask! It stood between them—made her even more unobtainable than she had been before. Yet the irony of the domino was that it made her more fascinating.

With the smoke curling slowly from her lips, she reminded him of a picture of a girl at a masquerade. On the verge of saying so, he caught himself in time. Perhaps a little music would divert her mind. No, hang it! That would only turn her thoughts into other channels equally as bad. What the devil could he say that didn't have some kick-back it was better to avoid.

"I've a thought," he suggested as one flashed across his mind. "It would do you a world of good to go out—get a breath of fresh Fall air. Suppose I phone for a limousine—"

"No, Jimmy—please. I'd rather not."

"Aileen, don't be foolish. If we meet anyone on the way downstairs, what difference does it make? You have to go out sometimes. Not a soul will notice us, once we are in the car. We can drive through the Park and over the bridge."

"But I have to get dinner for Vivienne—"

"We'll be back in lots of time." He did not say what he wanted to in reply to that objection.

"Really, Jimmy—some other day."

"Oh, come on. Be a sport. I dare you!"

He could have bitten his tongue for saying that. Garland Woodward had said it to Vivienne on the night of Channing's party. Aileen, of course, had heard him, just as Jimmy had. Now, his well intentioned effort had brought all that back to her.

"No," she said very gently. "If you don't mind—I won't." Of course she wanted to go with him, but she knew it would not be wise. Aileen would not chance their being alone in the intimate proximity of a limousine. They would be even more alone than they were in the apartment. In the car they would sit side by side. Jimmy's hand would touch hers. After a while she knew that he would take her in his arms.

And Aileen wanted terribly to feel them tight about her! Only now, she never would. Because she could never—never—run the risk of his seeing her face.

A new temptation comes to Vivienne tomorrow, born of remorse and despair.
