GOLF GOSSIP

Where Were Financiers? It is difficult to figure out just whom Messrs. Smith and DeForest did beat, on their way to their own combat. But they had to eliminate at least seven entries apiece, because one must win eight matches to become a British amateur champion. An anomaly is apparent when a golfer like Mr. Smith can win the toughest golfing competition in the world. The only answer I can work out is that somebody must win. The few favorites, submerged in a field of 270 players, doubtless wear themselves out beating golfers who, according to our American notions, ought not to be in a championship, until they get so fed up and stale that some neophyte comes along and smacks him, as Andrew Jamieson smacked Bobby at Muirfield in 1926. How many times have you heard of Jamieson since?
