SUNDOWN STORIES
MORE TRAVELING.
By Mary Graham Bonner.
The Little Black Clock had turned the time backward for their latest adventure, and John and Peggy had been part of a great procession of people who were pioneering through the country.
Now the Clock met them once more and they asked to go on with these people who were ready and willing and even eager to risk dangers and discomforts in order to build up the country.
So once more John and Peggy joined the covered wagons and the people who were going to make a settlement.
At night, the sounds of animals came to their ears—the animals with them and the animals who made their homes in the wild, untouched country.
There were thrilling moments, but there were long, miserable times when nothing exciting happened to make one want to feel brave.
Those times to John and Peggy seemed hardest.
But Peggy and John would not have missed taking part of this trip for anything in the world.
Not only had they seen roads made through forests, but they had seen how part of the country was developed and how treaties had been made with magnificent Indians so they could travel through the country.
The children were so glad that none of these people had fought the Indians, as John and Peggy loved the Indians and had always felt they had their rights, too.
As they told the Little Black Clock, if ever they took a trip across the country they would think of those processions of people daily; to build a trail to homestead settlements.
