VARIETY IN MENU EASILY OBTAINED BY MODERN WIFE

For many years there was little or no variety in typical American menus.

In this day and age, however, the recipes of the whole world are available, and it is the opinion of Miss Hester Heath, conductress of the popular "Kitchen Chautauqua," coming to Medford on March 30, 31 and April 1, under the auspices of this newspaper, that housewives should take advantage of the great mass of new dishes available to them.

Scientific development of canning and packing food products has enabled the modern housewife to draw from her food shelves Russian caviar, Mexican chili, English sautes, French dressings, Swiss cheese and other foods from the four corners of the world.

These food items have been made available to housewives more swiftly than the information on how to use the foods has been disseminated to them.

At Miss Heath's cooking school, however, romantic delicacies from all over the world will be a part and will be discussed extensively.

Miss Heath says, "peculiarly enough some of the most attractive dishes of the world-famous chefs are prepared from the least expensive ingredients. It is skillful knowledge of preparation which must be carried out if successful results are to be obtained. Some of the simplest, homiest items can be made to look princely on the average table, if properly prepared."

Miss Heath not only brings dishes with the tang of discovery and romance in her cooking school programs but outlines simple, varied and palatable menus for the family table.

She has a world of little handy suggestions as to how your everyday dishes can be more simply made—how left-overs can be used, and how to make every minute spent in your kitchen more interesting.

You will get the frills and furbelows of cooking at this cooking school, as well as the three-meal-a-day, roast-beef-and-potato courses.

Miss Heath will arrive here shortly before the opening of the Kitchen Chautauqua and will inspect local markets carefully in order to gather material for the series of marketing hints which she always gives at her cooking school.

She recommends that an eye be kept on the purse, as well as on the table, in any kitchen, and she plans to make these marketing hints strictly local and to use any local delicacies available in her programs.
