

DEMOCRATS HIT PROUD CITADELS OF PARTY FOES

Governmental Economy and Sound Administration Draw Heavy Fire in Early Campaign Maneuvers.

By Byron Price (Chief of Bureau, The Associated Press, Washington)

To the complete surprise of many political observers, two of the proudest citadels in the whole republican line of defense—governmental economy and sound administration—have come suddenly under sustained democratic attack in congress.

By the maneuver known to military men as a swift turning movement the democratic besiegers unexpectedly have left the battered prohibition and depression salients on their flank. Doubtless they mean to turn later to those touchy spots.

But it is plain enough now that the drive for administrative reorganization and less government spending is destined likewise to become a major part of the campaign.

The developments in congress are all the more important because the democratic program for 1932 is being written almost entirely on capitol hill.

The three presidential possibilities most prominently in the picture—Franklin D. Roosevelt, Alfred E. Smith and John N. Garner—are making no campaign speeches. The compromise, Newton D. Baker, is almost as silent.

The job of determining democratic strategy rests squarely on the congress leaders, and they are accepting that responsibility eagerly.

Republicans Surprised For many years the business-like conduct of government has been a republican talking-point.

The number of elections won on that issue would indicate a wide popular conviction that the republicans, by predilection and experience, are better fitted than the democrats for the task of general administration.

Most republicans felt here was one issue unlikely to be raised seriously by the democrats, particularly in a campaign so plentifully supplied with other issues.

The first democratic promise to beat down appropriations did not impress the republican leaders because they felt sure no such promise could be kept.

When President Hoover proposed that congress give him wide authority to reorganize the government, few of his advisers foresaw that the response would be a democratic undertaking to let congress itself do the reorganization.

It is scarcely expected that the democratic reorganization bill, for the abolition of numerous bureaus and commissions and the contraction of others, will reach the president in a form he can consistently approve. Yet the agreement that something should be done is so universal that a veto would mean a redoubled democratic attack on the administration.

G. O. P. Claims Reaction The reasons for this democratic strategy do not lie entirely in the issues of economy and administration.

Both with respect to the prohibition and depression issues things were becoming complicated, and party leaders felt it would be just as well to turn the attack into some other quarter.

More and more frequently of late republican scouts have been reporting a change for the better in the popular attitude toward Mr. Hoover. The burden of these reports is that the blame heaped on the republicans on account of business conditions has been so unmerited that a reaction has set in; that many begin to feel Hoover has been abused and to sympathize with him.

It should be noted that these assertions come from republican sources, yet they make the opposition ponder, because the possibility of such a reaction has long been foreseen by democratic leaders.

Can It Last? Perhaps the most surprising element at present is that with their narrow majority the democratic house leaders are able to exercise the control they do, executing their turning movements and turning their attacks with perfect discipline.

Everyone in Washington is wondering whether this democratic phalanx can hold together until adjournment or will blow up one of these days with a bang that will echo right down through the campaign to election day.
