WE REFUSE to believe now that crossing of the seas by great airships will become the accepted and regular thing, but we mustn't forget that our grandfathers didn't believe that the automobile would ever become a regular and accepted means of transportation.

THIS writer, who may be wholly wrong, but doesn't think so, has an idea that in this great country, which is more interested in the future than in the past, we should not think of houses in terms of generations, as they do in Europe.

Why build a house for all time. anyway? Wouldn't it be far better to build for the PRESENT, with all the conveniences and all the comforts at present available, and then when science and progress have provided conveniences and comforts far in advance of anything we know now, scrap the old house and build a new one-just as we scrap the old automobile when a far better one
