Axe Throwers Will Appear Holly Stage—The Oregon Loggers, real woodmen, every one, present one of the most novel entertainments on the American stage, because of the fact that they are the genuine article. Unlike hundreds of "cowboy" stage acts entertaining via radio and stage, and who have never seen a horse, the Oregon Loggers are real loggers and rough, ready backwoodsmen every one. And as it happens, all are fine musicians and all sing the tunes they sang around the bunkhouse fires at night—the good old tunes that stir the heart as none other can. "Rigger Blim" yodels his numbers, just as he once yodelled calls to the "whistle-punk" as he guided the huge logs of the Oregon forests down the hillsides.

Every logger is a real woodman, and Ole, when the stage is large enough, proves it by throwing huge slogs into logs. Like the boys themselves, the act is rough and without polish because one does not find polish in a logging camp. The loggers will entertain Holly fans Wednesday.
