RETURN OF HORSE MEANS SALVATION DECLARES HANLEY

SALEM, Oct. 5.—(AP)—The return of horses to the farm would be the salvation of agriculture, and were the horse population today comparable with that of 1920, more than 50,000,000 acres now used in the consumption by humans would be needed to produce feeds for horses. This was the assertion here today of William Hanley, eastern Oregon farmer and former member of the state highway commission. Hanley was here to attend a conference of farmers to consider ways and means of stimulating interest in horses. Max Gehlhar, director of agriculture, produced figures to show that the farmers who were surviving in the present financial situation were those who relied upon horses for power. Plans for a survey of the horse population in the state and probable demands during the next five years were made. "Machinery has contributed more to present depressed conditions of agriculture in the country than any other single factor," Hanley said. "In the first place, the use of machinery involves a big investment and continued outlay for gasoline, oil and repairs. In the second place, it has released millions of acres formerly devoted to the production of horse feed for the production of wheat and corn for human consumption, resulting in our present surplus for such its ruinous prices for all farm products."
