AMERICAN GIRL BRAVES RUSSIA IN ART PURSUIT

MOSCOW—(AP)—Leaving her goldfish and alligators behind in her New York studio, Margaret Bourke-White has shouldered her cameras and come again to Soviet Russia in pursuit of her art.

The slim, vivacious young brunet who worked her way through college by cashing in on her camera hobby, then developed that hobby until she became one of America's leading industrial photographers, is on her third visit to Russia.

"I'm going to do the oil fields this time," she said, "and then if I have time when I come back to Moscow I'll shoot some stuff on what is being done here for children and motherhood—hospitals, clinics, schools and that sort of thing."

Miss Bourke-White's enthusiasm for all forms of life and activity here—an enthusiasm which moved her to write a book about her first trip—has not waned with the repetition of her visits.

Eschewing all things political, she believes that the human drama enacted here, as mirrored in the faces and figures of people and in the machines and smokestacks of factories, is the best possible subject for her camera.

One regret marred the anticipation of the new adventures ahead of her, not the least of which is the hardship of a journey of several days on a Russian train. She had to leave her newly acquired pet goldfish and alligators in New York. There they remain in her studio on the 61st floor of one of Manhattan's skyscrapers.

When Miss Bourke-White comes to Russia she is treated as a distinguished guest by government leaders, who are great admirers of her work. They give her the all-important documents which smooth the way for her travels and admit her to places from which she otherwise would be barred.

But even she is not immune to the Soviet regulation prohibiting the transportation of undeveloped photographic films and plates out of the country. There are no private darkroom facilities available so she converts her hotel bathroom into a darkroom and develops her negatives in the bath-tub in order that they may be submitted to the censor.
