LOCAL STUDENTS IN NORMAL PLAY

Effect of Irrigation Upon Number of Fruits Per Tree

The number of fruits per tree depends upon three factors: (1) size of tree, (2) amount of bloom, and (3) amount of bloom that sets and holds its fruit. Size of tree—Increasing the available soil moisture increases the size of the tree. Measurements of the length of growth of branches in the Klamath experiments show that, with more available soil moisture, the branches made more growth. With greater length of branch growth, the tree will develop a more extended bearing area, thereby increasing the number of fruits per tree. It should be kept in mind that branch growth in length is completed each year by the middle of July.

Chapter III. Anjou certainly bloom exuberantly.

From counts made at Medford Experiment Station last year it was found that medium-sized Anjou trees had about 45,000 blossoming points, or about 315,000 individual blossoms. The same trees, bearing a moderate crop, carried to maturity only 800 pears. In other words, only about 9 per cent of the blossoms formed fruits which were harvested. Blossoming is a dehydrating process. We believe that trees which do not blossom excessively should have less fruit drop in late spring. This point will be carefully studied this coming spring. If we find that, other things being equal, a lighter bloom is followed by less dropping of fruit than is a heavy bloom, we may be able to use irrigation to reduce the amount of bloom, and thereby check the usual serious dropping of Anjou fruit during late May and June.
