Great War Drama Unfolds in Jehol; Invaders Face Mountain Strongholds

Jehol, where Japanese, Manchurians and Chinese clash, is shown in this sketch map with Japanese flags flying at Peipiao and Kailu, jumping off places for the drive intended to reach Jehol City and annex the whole province to the Tokyo-fostered state of Manchukuo. Chinese flags fly at the capital and also at Lingyuan and Chihfeng, strongholds in the mountains where the soldiers of Old Cathay hope to check the invaders.

(By the Associated Press)

The third act in Japan's drama of Manchuria has opened with the action set in Jehol, a mountainous railwayless land of opium traders and ancient Chinese tradition.

The first curtain rose in Mukden, capital of Manchuria, September 18, 1931, when the Japanese seized the arsenals of Chang Hsiao-Liang and drove him into northern China.

There followed erection of the state of Manchukuo, the summoning of Henry Pu-Yi, former "boy emperor" of China, to act as its nominal executive, its formal recognition by Tokyo and a defensive alliance between the island empire and the infant government.

Then Manchukuo and Japan jointly claimed Jehol as an integral part of the new nation. Chinese protests to the League of Nations and that body's condemnation of the whole Japanese program had no effect upon this militaristic policy.

After months of preparation the troops of Manchukuo and Japan swarmed across the border. They started their big push from Peipoa, halfway up the old boundary, and from Kailu, northern gateway city.

At the mountain strongholds of Lingyuan and Chihfeng the riflemen and machine gunners of Chang Hsiao-Liang await the columns, with real war as the prospect.
