L. A. Banks History Here Full of Turmoil From First Days of His Arrival

(By Eva Nealon Hamilton) L. A. Banks, who rolled into Medford for the first time from the south in about the year 1925 in a flashy Cadillac car, bringing promise, in the California manner, of unlimited prosperity for the fruit industry of the Rogue River valley, pines crops oblivious to frosts, and millions to be brought from the land—left Thursday to occupy a cell in the Josephine county jail. Police sirens screamed through the city to mark his departure. With guards to the right and the left of him he was transported to Grants Pass before engaged citizens could do him harm.

Charged with murder in the first degree for the slaying of Constable George Prescott he remains in the Josephine county jail today. Records in the Jackson county clerk's office show that during the years he has lived, or held properties in Medford, he has become involved in 31 civil cases and that four criminal charges have been brought against him.

It was during the "good years" that Banks came to Medford. Everybody was prospering. He bought extensive lands, paying a little down, giving mortgages for the remainder. Always immaculately clad, he inspired colorful stories of his greatness. The number of suits in his closet was listed at 40, all tailor-made. None priced at less than $100.

Pictures of his "palatial" home in Riverside, Calif., said his home in Medford had been in the newspapers. Frequent interviews on the fruit situation, the futility of amending and other reactionary ideas of the newcomer were published. Banks still divided his time between California and the Rogue River valley.

About 1921 one of his first known appearances in the court resulted from a disagreement with the United States government over spray residue. The case was tried in the United States court in Illinois. Banks was defeated.

In 1929 he bought himself a newspaper to acquire more space, according to the story for the advancement of his own ideas for the promotion of property interests in the Rogue River valley.

The first issues of the Medford Daily News carried optimistic stories of the agricultural outlook. Guests were invited to visit the plant on West Main street, which boasted of mahogany furnishings. Gradually a vein of condemnation began to ooze through the lines of the newspaper.

An attack was started against the party case into court, after repeated delays on the part of Banks, the last-mentioned party was arrested, according to his former counsel, M. O. Wilkins and declared, "Now bring on Gus Newbury."

The newspaper was returned to the original owners less than four years after purchased by Banks. Without the newspaper through which to talk he continued his protests through the Good Government congress, bringing out a weekly newspaper at the Pacific Record Herald plant.

Thursday to serve a warrant issued on a grand jury indictment, involving Banks in the theft of ballots from the court house vaults, Officer Prescott called at his home. He was shot and killed. Less than four years after he came to Medford to make his home, Banks left Medford for a jail cell, his arrest on a murder charge bringing a gruesome climax to his stormy period of citizenship here.

with overwhelming defeat. In an answer to the News Publishing company in the recent suit for recovery of the newspaper, he claimed that up to July 1, 1930, he was a resident of California. It was eight days after that date that he filed his acceptance as a candidate for the senate. According to the Oregon law six months is the period of time required to qualify for citizenship.

Following his defeat in the senatorial race, the barrage of criticism continued. But, after suit was filed against him in the local courts for collection of money, then came action with overwhelming defeat.
