The New Fire Fighters

"FIRE weather" signals are posted through Pacific Northwest forests. The warning creates more alarm than a year ago, because there is more demand these days for lumber, and the outlook is brighter.

This year, friends of the forests will watch with interest the relation of civilian conservation camps to fire fighting. Always hitherto "fire weather" has meant mobilization of emergency forces. The federal forest service, the state forestry departments and the timber owners' associations have mobilized into fire brigades. Osburn fire-finders and other devices, together with airplane observation, have made it easy to spot fires. Trail systems and the telephone have expedited inward movement of fire fighting forces, followed by equipment and supplies. But all this has been slow compared with results obtainable if men had been on the ground. Through the forests of the Northwest are now scattered the camps of the civilians who have been granted emergency employment. The first reports of fires that have broken out have been coincident with announcement that civilian conservation workers were hurried from nearby camps to the scenes of destruction.

The genius of fire fighting is to get quickly upon the ground. A fire may smolder until it gains intensity, then spread with the fierce speed of racing wild horses. It may die down during the night, and, under the encouragement of the next day's sun, break out into uncontrollable fury.

The carcless camper, the lightning bolt, sparks from boilers, and flames that spread from ill-advised fires in settler slashings, may start forest fires. It becomes the business of every available force in the great forest districts to stop them. When trees burn, our first cash crop is going up in smoke and our regulators of stream-flow are being erased.

If civilian conservation men as fire fighters prove effective they may save during the next 30 days several times the cost of having them in the forests .- (Portland Journal).
