CATTLE LARCENY DEFENDANTS GET TRIAL, LENIENCY

Thos. P. King, 26, of Eagle Point, and Clarence C. Day, an older man from the same locality, arrested some time ago on a cattle theft charge, growing out of the butchering of a calf in the care of Fred Luy, appeared in circuit court this morning, represented by Attorney E. E. Kelly, to enter guilty pleas.

The case was assigned to trial by jury after their story was told the court, who insisted that he didn't want them entering guilty pleas under any misapprehension that they would be paroled.

Attorney Kelly stated that the calf was shot for a deer in an inaccessible country out from Lost Lake, and that when the men realized they had injured the animal, they proceeded to kill and butcher it, taking one quarter with them. He stated that the men offered to pay Luy for the animal and that he refused their money.

District Attorney Coddling informed the court that he found many discrepancies in the stories told by the two since their arrest, and that he felt sure that the chief idea of the men was to get some meat.

In the case of the state vs. Milroy Charley, 27, on a cattle theft charge Judge Norton announced a suspended sentence for six months, emphasizing to the cripple that he took his condition into consideration and realized that he was not altogether responsible for his acts. He added that if any repetition of the cattle thievery occurred, he would be called into custody and that his family as well as himself would be expected to stop their depredations.
