A Prohibition Party

THE rejuvenation of a national Prohibition party, following the repeal of the 18th amendment, has at least two things to commend it.

First, such action will allow the extreme Drys, who are interested in nothing but the liquor issue, a sure and satisfactory, medium for political expression, now denied them in the two major parties.

Second, the formation of a Prohibition party will eliminate the hypocritical professional politicians, in both major parties, who in fear of losing votes, have flirted in public with the W. C. T. U., and then in private have ordered a case of Scotch from their favorite bootlegger.

WITH prohibition repeal an accomplished fact, the lines can be sharply drawn between those who believe in continuing the wet-dry agitation, with a view to "repealing" the repeal, and those who don't—but prefer to regard the matter of repeal an accomplished fact, and for the time being at least, a closed incident.

The confirmed and uncompromising Drys will align themselves with the first faction; a vast majority of the American people, with the second.

The only liquor issue remaining with the second faction, will be regarding the best method, by which legalized liquor can be controlled, so as to gain the maximum economic benefit, and the minimum moral loss. Neither major party will concern itself with a repeal of the repeal—a return to national prohibition,—which with Kentucky returns in, has been overwhelmingly repudiated by 37 states out of 48, and only endorsed by two!

Certainly minority political action is an inalienable democratic right; but in the face of such a popular referendum, SHOULDNT such an OVERWHELMING majority RULE!

On the Spot

PROBABLY no individual is more interested in the outcome of this latest Cuban revolution that Sumner Welles, the American ambassador to that country.

The Roosevelt administration was prepared to recognize the present Cuban government of Grau San Martin, but Welles advised against it. Being on the ground, and a young man of excellent judgment, his view prevailed.

If the Grau San Martin government is overthrown, Ambassador Welles wins. If it isn't, and this uprising is crushed, then he loses—and in all likelihood will retire.

It is a very critical time for Mr. Welles. It took plenty of stamina to stand against the de facto government, but in a situation like this the stamina of an individual doesn't count. It is a matter of being wise before the event,—wise and lucky.

If Ambassador Welles guessed right he is "made;" if he guessed wrong he is down and out as far as diplomacy is concerned.

The next few days are very momentous ones for Mr. Welles!

He Takes the Palm!

SPEAKING of stamina we would like to pay a tribute to this General Johnson at the head of the administration's N. R. A. program.

For sheer intestinal fortitude he deserves the Croix de Guerre with a palm. He may not be the wisest or most diplomatic man in the world; but when it comes to actual animal courage, we doubt if he has a peer.

With the farmers of the Middle West in revolt, with feeling against the Roosevelt administration and the N. R. A. at a fever heat, this titular head and official spokesman of the entire program, proceeds to invade the corn belt alone, and take the stump in defense of his policies and against the embattled malcontents.

If such action doesn't take "guts" then please tell us what does! Win, lose or draw, the General has our vote, for the most fearless dare-devil, two-fisted scrapper in the national arena today.

The Only Way

THE issue in this state educational controversy is clearly drawn. As long as Chancellor Kerr remains in his position, the strife and dissension will continue. When, and only when another chancellor is selected, from outside the state, in no way involved in the mess, it will STOP.

This is the problem in a nut shell, and arguments pro and con can be advanced until Doomsday, but will contribute nothing more to its solution.

The issue is NOT a personal one—no one questions Dr. Kerr's abilities as demonstrated at O. S. C., or his integrity as a man. The fact remains, that placing the institutions of higher learning in this state, under the control of the former executive head of one of them, hasn't worked, and CAN'T work. It simply isn't in the cards.

Had the former President of the university been placed in Dr. Kerr's position, the situation today would have been the same.

The only thing to do now, is what should have been done at the outset,—select as chancellor, the best educator available who has never been involved in the state controversy, and has never been connected with either institution.

Then the entire state can get together behind a harmonious and constructive educational program.

Communications

Seems to Be "Against."

To the Editor:
In the Tribune of November 8th, you ask your readers to write in their views on a sales tax, especially those who opposed a sales tax at the last election. If that election did not convince you that the people of Oregon will never stand for a sales tax, what on earth would?

California has a different meaning than you would convey. Of course the darned thing works; every woman who goes out with a market basket to buy groceries or clothing for the family has found out that her money will buy a little less; that they must get along with less of everything, and it is not a tax that comes once a year, but every time they spend a dollar for the bare necessities of life.

Your article, "The Darned Thing Works," is very misleading, and those familiar with conditions in Medford, November 8.

WHY THE DOG PANTS?

Nearly ninety per cent of the heat loss of the body occurs through evaporation of water from the skin (sweat) and radiation and conduction from the skin. Ten per cent of the heat loss occurs through the warming of air by the lungs and the vaporization of water from the lungs—the expired air is nearly saturated with water vapor.

A dog pants in very hot weather because the dog's skin is not equipped with vasomotor nerves over most of the body, nerves which, in man, react to heat by producing sweating, and the dog's hair interferes with free loss of heat by radiation, so the dog has to do the best he can by warming more air with his lungs and vaporizing more water through the air he breathes. He pants to keep cool.

Having learned that ordinary air contains only 4 parts of carbon dioxide in a thousand, and the air a person expires contains nearly 44 parts of carbon dioxide in a thousand, some persons imagine that if in the expired air that accounts for the ill effects of "foul" air. This is not so, nor is the depressing effect of vitiated or "impure" air due to the diminished proportion of oxygen in the expired air (ordinary air contains more than 200 parts of oxygen in a thousand and the expired breath only 16 parts). It has been proved over and over again that no unpleasant consequence occurs when an individual breathes air containing the proportions of carbon dioxide and oxygen found in expired air.

When the comparatively harmlessness of expired air was scientifically established, some persons conceived a theory that an unrecognized "toxin" or "poison" or similar organic poison exhaled from the lungs might account for the ill effects of "bad" air. But this theory is no longer entertained.

We know now that the disagreeable symptoms produced by exposure to "foul" air, are due to overheating of the air, increased humidity or moisture (evaporated by bodies) and stagnation of the air, absence of draft or motion. Subjects confined in hermetically sealed chambers equipped with means of cooling the air, keeping it in motion, and removing excess of moisture, can breathe the limited amount of air over and over without suffering any unpleasant consequences, but if the fan stops or the other air conditioning provisions are interrupted, the occupants of the chamber quickly develop the mental dullness, nausea, headache and other familiar symptoms of "bad" air.

Air temperature and motion are usually easy to provide, and when these two factors are provided, the humidity will regulate itself. Hygienically the ideal room temperature is between 64 and 68 degrees F., for living rooms or offices, and for work or play rooms the temperature should be somewhat lower. For sleeping rooms it may be as low as the outside temperature, provided artificial warmth or covers keep one comfortable in bed.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Best Book on Hygiene.
Please tell us what would be the best book on hygiene for our library. Of course we want something authoritative and of broad application...
—H. P. T.

Answer—Rosenau's "Preventative Medicine and Hygiene" published by Appleton, is the best textbook I know. A copy of this will set you back 10 berries, if I recollect, but it will be worth the cost in any library.
Saltpeper.

At national guard camp the cook informed me that a small amount of saltpeper was put in the food. The results were beneficial to my case. Is it possible to take this at home, and if so how much?—B. D.

Answer—Saltpeper (potassium nitrate) is commonly used in preserving or pickling meats, to keep the meat red and fresh-looking. I am not aware that it is ever added to food in cooking, and I know of no purpose in so using it or in giving it as medicine.

Forty and Flabby.
Some people may be fair, fat and 40, but I'm just flabby. Isn't there some way to keep from going all floppy when one passes the dread age of 40?—Mrs. M. H. S.

Answer—Sure, Mike. Can you afford 10 or 15 minutes a day? If so, play over the Last Brady Symphony on your metabolism once or twice a day. Bend a dime and a stamped envelope bearing your address and ask for the words and music of the Last Brady Symphony. And don't try to palm off a clipping of this in lieu. (Copyright, 1933, John P. Comment on the Day's News

By FRANK JENKINS

THIS writer attended a lodge meeting in Klamath Falls the other night, and over the refreshments that followed the meeting a little group of old-timers grew reminiscent of the early days in that country—the "good old days," you know.

These reminiscences dealt with banking, with property values, with taxpaying, with the status of newspapers in those days—a rather wide range of subjects. They pictured a freedom and ease of living, a broad measure of confidence in one's fellow men, that slowly are passing, even down here in Southern Oregon.

This writer found them fascinating.

"BANKING in the early days of this country," George Grizzle, county judge of Klamath, was reminded, "was pretty much of a free and easy institution. Depositors put in money when they had it, and wrote checks when they wanted to. 'If there wasn't money enough in the account to cover the checks, which were apt to be large, they went as overdrafts, and the overdrafts were paid at the first convenient time."

"The point is that they were ALWAYS paid. Those old-timers regarded an obligation as an obligation."

"BUT, in the course of time, and with the passing of new laws, the banks had to tighten up in their methods. As a part of this tightening up process, one of them notified one of its customers one day that he was considerably overdrawn."

"When he got the notice, he blew up. 'What do you mean, jumping me about my overdraft?' he wrote indignantly: 'When I've got $15,000 or $20,000 in your bank, do I come around every day or so wanting to know what you're doing with it and insinuating that I may not get it back?'"

"HERE'S something you may not believe in, these days," Nate Otterbein, an old-time printer, chimed in, "but it's true: 'Back in the early days in this country, the BORROWER and not the lender was as like as not to keep the note. I remember one such case. One man lent another several thousand dollars. When the note was made out and the borrower tendered it to him, he said: 'No, you keep it. If I took it, I'd probably lose it, but if you keep it I'll know it's safe. Besides, if you have the note with you it will be a reminder to you of when it's due.'"

IMAGINE that, if you can! What a country this must have been back in those early days, when everybody had confidence in everybody else—at least, so far as paying debts was concerned!

"THE first piece of property I acquired in this town," Judge Grizzle recollected, "cost me $300. I told the man who wanted to sell it to me: 'I'll give you $100 six months hence, $100 more in 12 months and the last $100 in 18 months.'"

"He said: 'That'll be all right; made out a deed to me, took back a mortgage and the property was mine. The first tax statement I got was for $2, and I was prouder than Punch. I'd become a property owner and a taxpayer, you see, and that was something to be proud of."

"My tax statements now are for a lot more, but instead of being proud of them, as I was then, I kick like everybody else."

WHEN you come to think of it, the judge was right back in those days. Being a taxpayer IS something to be proud of. It's a sign you're getting along in the world and beginning to amount to something.

If a lot more of us thought of our taxes in that way, it would be a lot better for the country and a lot better for US.

UNFORTUNATELY, most of us have formed the habit of thinking of our taxes as something going out and nothing COMING BACK.

That isn't true at all. In return for our tax money, we get very definite benefits indeed. We get schools, a roads and police protection, and a LOT OF THINGS.

We get these things just as definitely in return for our tax money as we get sugar when we go to the grocery store and pay money for it.
