Joel McCrea Star
Of Double Feature
Program at Rialto

Another double bill consisting of two major first-run feature pictures opens at the Rialto theatre tomorrow for a three day run.

"Chance at Heaven," with Joel McCrea, Marlin Nixon and Ginger Rogers featured and "Bondage," starring Dorothy Jordan, will be the two features to be shown, with selected short reels rounding out the program.

"Chance at Heaven" was written by Vina Delmar and is a story of a small town boy in love with a country girl who is swept off his feet by the infatuation lavished on him by the city debutante. An elopement with the sophisticated girl makes him realize how much he cares for his rustic sweetheart.

"Bondage" pictures the unthinking cruelty to which a careless society girl is subjected as an unfortunate victim of her baser passions. The story is convincingly told; the acting exceptionally fine, particularly that of Dorothy Jordan. The world may consider an unwed mother an outcast, but to women she arouses their deepest sympathies.

Of such material is the plot of "Bondage" written. Alexander Kirkland has the leading male role.

"Ann Vickers" taken from the sensational novel by Sinclair Lewis and starring Irene Dunne and Walter Huston, and "Above the Clouds," an exciting film story of the newsworld, premiering, play at the Rialto for the last time tonight.

An innovation was introduced at the Rialto yesterday when attendants passed through the audience with cushions and house slippers for rent and sandwiches for sale.

Your Sunday's issue of December 10th contains a communication signed "J. L. Kerahaw" whose dairy is nearly opposite the Red Top school-house, east of Medford. In closing, Mr. Kerahaw states "My place is open for public inspection at any and all times." I think that's just fun. I wish all consumers of milk would visit the sources of their milk supply frequently; it might help both them and the producers. Nearly all our latter have offered this same courteous invitation. Possibly the most interesting time to visit the dairies is during milking and bottling periods.

War Days Recalled
By Craterian Film

All the frenzied excitement of New York's celebration of Armistice day, November 11, 1918, is seen in "Only Yesterday" which is now playing at the Craterian.

Hundreds of delirious celebrants throng the downtown streets, shouting, dancing and blowing horns, filling the air with confetti and giving themselves over completely to expressing their joyous relief at the ending of the World war. Ordinarily staid citizens join in impromptu parades, bearing aloft hastily made signs such as "It's All Over But the Shouting," "We Paid the Price" and "The World Is Safe for Democracy." Millionaires and laborers dance together in joyous abandon, and soldiers and sailors suddenly become bosom "pals."
