HOLLYWOOD (UP)—Somewhere between the Panama Canal and Hollywood recently, on her first trip to the film capital, Jean Muir lost one half of a carefully developed dual personality.

The tall young actress, who was known on Broadway as Jean Muir, with emphasis on the "air," both in spelling and pronunciation, decided after signing a Warner Brothers contract to change her "type" along with her name.

"I will be mysterious," she promised herself. "I will become inhibited. I will no longer say what I think or think about what I say."

Jeann had her determination for the first half of the long voyage, developing her "other side," being mysterious and different—and confounding fellow passengers by her strange moods and melancholies.

By the time the boat reached the canal, Jeann had her dual personality well in hand. Her pale face and questioning blue eyes seemed to make a tortured soul. Deck chair neighbors began to refer to her as "poor thing."

Then, suddenly, Jeann decided she couldn't do it. She resented the sympathy of traveling companions and developed a yen to take part in dinner table discussions. She went to her stateroom as the boat was passing Central America and strangled her "other half" to death.

It needed heroic measures, of course, to make sure the other passenger understood the momentous transformation. She waited until a question about a political subject was put timidly but directly to her.

Passed by the City Council and signed by me in open session in authentication of its passage this 6th day of March, 1934.
