Shown here is the main lodge of the Little Bohemia resort near Mercer, Wis., where John Dillinger and six of his gunmen escaped after a gun battle with federal agents and police. CAT NAP NATURAL FOR HUMAN BEING DECLARE SAVANTS

All-Night Sleep and All-Day Awake Is Habit Picked Up Since Brain Gained More Power, Scientists Claim

By F. B. COLTON
Associated Press Science Writer
WASHINGTON.—(AP) It isn't natural for humans to sleep all night. That's the latest finding of scientific sleep studies, and new comfort, incidentally, for youngsters who hate to go to bed early and night-life devotees who like to come in with the milkman.

If the human race followed its instinct, people would catch half a dozen brief naps through the day and night instead of concentrating their daily slumber in one eight-hour stretch. Should man's primordial sleep habits ever reassert themselves from out of the dim past, the world's work might cease several times through the 24 hours while everybody took a cat-nap.

Long Sleep Just Habit
The night-long sleep with 16 hours of uninterrupted wakefulness in between is just a habit man has picked up since he gained greater brain power, says a summary of sleep studies just published by the National Research Council. And, although the habit seems firmly rooted, it really wouldn't be so difficult for a man to slip back into the old cat-nap pattern of sleep followed by the lower animals, the scientists say.

It requires brains to sleep as humans do, the research shows. If the cortex, or gray matter of a man's brain, were removed, he probably would be unable to sleep a solid eight hours.

This has been shown by experiments with dogs. Normal dogs have enough gray matter to learn and follow the habit of sleeping all night and staying awake all day. But dogs with the gray matter of their brains removed lose the habit and have half a dozen periods of sleep through the day.

It explains why new-born babies sleep at intervals and then awaken. A young baby's higher brain centers are not yet "wired up" to the rest of its nervous system, so it acts like an animal without gray matter in its sleep habits.
