Zasu Pitts With Pert Kelton In Craterian Hit

If all the people who think they might have had careers and become famous and wealthy if only something or other had not prevented, were laid end to end they would look pretty silly lying there. And besides, that is no way to go about remedying the disappointments.

Zasu Pitts is afflicted with a career complex in "Sing and Like It," at the Craterian theatre Friday and Saturday, and this provides the basic theme for this convulsing farce which is proving so pleasing to theatre-goers.

In this boisterous comedy, Miss Pitts, as Annie Spodgrass, is convinced that she might have been a great singer if only she had not fallen in love with the weak-chinned Oswald. But then, suddenly, when all hope for the glitter and unrelenting romance and glamor that is the stage is almost gone, comes The Chance! Nat Pendleton, in the role of a mush-headed gang chief, thinks Zasu's singing of mammy songs is elegant, and he abducts her to put her in a show.

After acquiring his star, the gangster has to kidnap a musical production to put her in, so elects to move in on a theatrical producer known as the "mad genius of the theatre," a part played by Edward Everett Horton. So Zasu is all set, and what she does with The Chance is the big laugh moment of the picture.

Aiding and abetting Miss Pitts, Horton and Pendleton in the cause of film foolishness, are Pert Kelton, co-starred with Miss Pitts as the gangster's gum-chewing girl friend, and Ned Sparks, Stanley Fields and Matt McHugh as a trio of funny villains.

She is as ruthless in love as in her financial dealings, for she carelessly casts the young men aside as soon as she tires of them and they try to carry the courtship into the office.

As Alison Drake, the business executive, she feels that she is a superwoman who is not bound by the ordinary conventions of the world about her. It is not until she discovers there is one man who will not succumb to her wiles that she wakes up to the fact that her slant on life is a twisted one. Not in a long while has Ruth Chatterton offered so powerful a portrayal and so moving a drama.
