

FARMING RECORDS BEING KEPT UNDER IMPETUS OF AAA

Two Million Farmers Signed Up With Government Now Will Have An Accurate Account of Transactions

One of the valuable by-products of the programs of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has been the impetus given farm record keeping. The two million farmers who have signed contracts with the federal government to limit production or who have applied for government loans are now keenly aware of the value of having accurate accounts of past transactions.

To meet this new demand the AAA has made available free of cost a farm account book for every contract signer, these to be distributed through the various county production control associations.

To make sure that these books are not merely handed out and forgotten, G. W. Kuhlman, a member of the farm management staff at O. S. C., has been assigned by the extension service to work with county agents and the control associations for the period of distribution and introduction of these new record books.

"Account books are of vital importance to every farmer not only as an aid in filling out contracts and proving compliance, but also in providing a basis for individual farm analysis and future planning," says Mr. Kuhlman.

"Recent developments in individual states and also in federal circles point to an agriculture founded on a logical plan rather than on a haphazard procedure. Farm records, through providing the information as to yields of crops, income from individual enterprises and farm organization, should aid materially in the development of these plans."

Mr. Kuhlman points out that the books being distributed by the government are not complete account books, but that they will serve as a beginning by affording a basis for estimating the probable farm income and planning the family finances.

Before these were issued Kuhlman had completed a revision of the Oregon Extension Service farm account book which is far more complete and which will be available at cost (25c) for those who desire to begin with a more inclusive set of records. Complete farm records include yearly inventories of all farm property, records of livestock and crop production, farm receipts, farm expenses, summary and analysis.

"An average of five minutes a day will keep such records up-to-date," says Mr. Kuhlman. "The inventories will require several additional hours at the beginning and the end of the year. A simple summary and analysis can be made in a few hours at the end of the year. Estimates of feed and labor for each enterprise will require part of an hour each month when such data are recorded."

As to when to start an account book, Kuhlman says January 1 is the best time, but that today is better than tomorrow or next January 1, as the important thing is to get started and benefit by the experience from now until the beginning of the new year.
