New G-3 Tire Causes Factory Boom

1 Fabric passing through the rolls of a calendar is impregnated with compounded rubber. 2 The tire-builder placing a ply on the drum on which the tire is built. 3 Placing tire in mold preparatory to vulcanization, or curing. 4 The finished tire gets the last of many inspections.

Visit to Plant Reveals Little-Known Phases of Tire Building; Inspections Legion Throughout Process.

AKRON, O. (Special)—Factories of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co. are running night and day, six days a week, with four six-hour shifts, making the new G-3 tire, latest addition to the automobile tire field.

Goodyear dealers in all sections report material sales increases since the advent of the new tire—hence the factory activity. The tire, the company's engineers claim, gives 43 per cent more non-skid mileage, with a flatter and thicker tread, wider riding ribs, more center traction and more non-skid blocks.

Contrary to the hazy impressions of many laymen, tires are not stamped out by a huge machine on the order of a doughnut mold. A visit to the giant Goodyear factories here reveals the many interesting operations necessary to build a tire.

Three elements in a tire—rubber, fabric and compounds—meet and merge at different stages in the process. Much of the rubber for the Goodyear G-3 and other tires is grown on the Goodyear plantations in Sumatra. It is shipped in bales which are cut into chunks here in a machine known as a "pie-cutter." Giant cylinders make these chunks and the compounds one integral mass ready for the tire fabric.

Much of the fabric is made in the company's textile mills from cotton grown on the Goodyear plantation in Arizona. After a warming process, the fabric is run through the triple rolls of a calendar where the compounded rubber is worked into it, emerging as rubberized cloth. An airbag is inserted in the newly-built tire and it goes to the "pit," or vulcanizing room.

After rigid inspections and machine-wrapping, the new tire goes to one of the 60,000 Goodyear dealers and distributors scattered all over the globe.

Constant, careful inspection at every step is one of the outstanding features of the process. No tire with the slightest flaw is ever allowed to get by this corps of lynx-eyed inspectors.

The twenty-four hour humming of the Goodyear plants is adding constantly to the company's outstanding record of 215,000,000 tires built since its organization in 1898 — millions more than by any other manufacturer. Of this enormous output 56 per cent was built in the last seven years.

A train of 110,000 freight cars, 830 miles long, would be required to ship all of these 215,000,0000 Goodyear tires. Laid end to end these tires would reach more than 100,000 miles, or four times around the equator.
