SPENCER TRACY AND JACK OAKIE 'The Thin Man' Is Mystery Comedy Starts Tuesday

At last, a different brand of mystery has been brought to the screen, one that takes a different tack and is filled with a joyous sparkle and sly performance. The picture is "The Thin Man," playing at the Crater Lake theater, with William Powell and Myrna Loy in the leading roles turning in characterizations that far surpass anything these two favorites have yet done. Reminful of another great piece of entertainment—"It Happened One Night"—this film fairly glows with a carefree joviality and intriguing entertainment. It can easily be classed as one of the most enjoyable motion pictures to be brought to the screen this year. Powell plays the part of Nick Charles, retired detective par excellence, married to wealthy and lovable Myrna Loy, and much more interested in playing around on his wife's wealth than be bothered by any detecting. But, comes a holiday in New York and Powell finds not just one murder mystery—but three—thrust upon him for solution. And here he is quite reminiscent of that famed Philo Vance character he made such a success of. But don't let the mystery part of it keep you thinking it's a straight-away mystery story. It isn't. Far from it, it could be more easily classified as a comedy, just as "It Happened One Night" was a comedy. Told with a deftness and a brilliance in both action and dialogue, there are times when the laughter that greets each new sally drowns out the following dialogue. Maureen O'Sullivan, Nat Pendleton and Minna Gombell turn in performances in keeping with the excellence of the two leads.

Tracy and Oakie have a series of thrilling adventures as telephone lineamen when they run afoul of wire-tappers and gangsters engaged in engineering a bank robbery. The two telephone girls who are their sweethearts, and incidentally the cause of many of their more humorous escapades, are played by Constance Cummings and Arline Judge.
