

SCOTLAND SEES 'UNITED FRONT' ON HOME RULE

Advocates Marshal Forces— Expect Parliament to Be Different From Others— Not Antagonistic England

By Oscar Leiding
EDINBURGH (AP)—Scotland's home rule advocates are marshaling their forces to win self-government. A united front has been formed by the fusion into a single Scottish nationalist party of the fighting youth of the national party of Scotland and the more moderate Scottish party.

Campaign material has been sought by a party delegation which visited Northern Ireland, the Irish Free State and the Isle of Man for a first-hand study of their parliaments.

Nationalist leaders—whose goal is a Scottish parliament for purely Scottish affairs—believe their cause so far advanced that they are already discussing not how to win self-government but what to do when they have it.

Scotland To Be "Different"
"We have not made up our minds exactly what kind of parliament we are going to have," said the Duke of Montrose, one of the leaders in the home rule campaign, "but just as the Northern, Free State, and Isle of Man parliaments differ from each other, so we expect our Scottish parliament will differ from them all."

The home rule campaign is unique in that its advocates are not antagonistic to England but claim that economic necessity calls for self-government.

Should Be Closer
Scotland's difficulty, says the Duke of Montrose, is that the country is 400 miles away from the parliament in London.

"A parliament must get closer to industrial questions," he said. Nationalists also point out that only 74 out of the 615 members of the house of commons are elected from Scotland.

The three-parliament tour by the party's delegation had as its object a first-hand study of the facts about self-government.

Eat More Meat Drive Started To Cut Surplus

"National meat packers and retailers are concerned with a widespread problem, the successful distribution and sale of the abundant meat supply, which the industry will soon be called upon to market," said Herb Meusel, of the Rogue River Meats, Inc., today, in announcing an "Eat more meat" drive to cut down the local surplus.

Mr. Meusel said "several factors are resulting in the marketing by the farmers of large numbers of meat animals. The drought, in particular, has forced the farmers to send in many cattle, hogs and sheep for which they are unable to provide feed and water.

"At the moment we are confronted with the necessity of marketing an unusually large supply of meat in the face of greatly reduced consumer buying power. Our responsibility to the consumer is to make available every possible pound of meat in fresh, wholesome condition, and our responsibility to the producer is to obtain every possible penny of value for their output."
