Lady By Choice Adds To Laurels Of May Robson

That grand old lady—May Robson—is back in another grand characterization in "Lady By Choice," which opened yesterday at the Rialto theatre for an extended run. And once again she runs away with the hearts of all those who see the picture.

Reminful of her performance in "Lady for a Day," the lovable Miss Robson is shown as a best-guessing, broken-down old hag who, when the break comes, suddenly turns into a motherly soul-retaining nevertheless the indomitable fighting spirit that made her such a colorful feature of Judge Daly's night court.

There are smiles and tears and many an honest-to-gosh "belly laugh." The story makes its drama a natural and stirring feature, and the comedy brings laugh after laugh from the audience. Hilarity is so well blended with seriousness that one never knows what to expect. And as such, it has all the essentials of a theatre manager's dream—real entertainment for everyone.

Miss Robson is Patsy Patterson, a venerable old soul who breaks up a saloon and lands for the seventh time in Judge Daly's (Walter Connolly) court. Alabam' Lee, (Carole Lombard) is also there for a fan dance held objectionable in the eyes of the law.

The old lady is paroled, much against her wishes, to an old ladies' home. Mother's Day rolls around and Alabam's press agent conceives the idea of having her adopt a mother for a publicity stunt. At the home, Alabam, recognizing Patsy, picks her out.

Installed in her job with much fanfare, Patsy takes it seriously. Pretty good with the galloping dominos, she gets enough of a stake to hire dramatic, vocal and dance instructors for her temperamental "daughter," and tries to lead her away from her chieftain, gold-digging tendencies. However, "daughter"
