PLANES DATE BACK TO ABOUT 1842 IS CLAIM OF EXPERT

Actual Invention 80 Years Before Wright Brothers Flight Found In History—Many Aided Developing.

WASHINGTON.—(UP)—Dr. Albert F. Zahm, chief congressional library's aeronautics division, believes the airplane actually was invented 80 years before Orville and Wilbur Wright made their famous flight at Kitty Hawk, N. C.

Dr. Zahm was wartime chief engineer for a leading airplane manufacturer. In his present post, he is the custodian of what is acknowledged to be the world's largest collection of aeronautical literature.

He said that as far as he knew, the Wrights "did a lot of inventing that was original with them but not new." He believes the brothers should receive due credit for their air pioneering, but doesn't think they should be called the "fathers of aviation."

Dr. Zahm said the history of aviation began in Britain in the first decade of the 19th century when Sir George Cayley made a full scale glider that carried a man and was propelled by gravity.

However, he declared, the principles upon which man flying is based were the work of the following men: William Samuel Henson, an Englishman who in 1842 made an actual working drawing of an airplane equipped with all features essential to pioneer flight.

Alexander Goupiol of France, who invented the modern system of airplane control surfaces in 1843. F. S. Stringfellow, another Englishman, who in 1846 built a model plane, scaled to Henson's design, powered it with a steam engine and made it fly.

Credits Mackenzie-Kennedy Another man who may be credited with scientific development of aviation, Dr. Zahm said, is Maj. C. H. J. Mackenzie-Kennedy, who was accused of being a spy at the recent naval house affairs subcommittee investigation of navy airplane purchases.

He had testified that American war planes were considerably below European standards. Major Mackenzie-Kennedy designed an airplane which would carry a machine gun and its operator in the tail, behind the rudder, this obviating a former military inconvenience.
