HOME ECONOMICS WORK DESCRIBED BY STATE LEADER

Claribel Nye Says Women Are Responding With Resourcefulness Worthy of Pioneer Grandmothers

The women's work division of the PERA, as outlined in an interview with Miss Claribel Nye, state leader of home economics extension work in Oregon State college, was written by Mary Greiner Kelly, formerly of Medford, and published in the Washington Post, of Washington, D. C. Miss Nye recently returned to her post in Oregon. During her absence Mrs. Mabel Mack, home demonstration agent for Jackson county, assumed the state duties.

The way a family is clothed and housed is more important psychologically than the way it is fed. A bit of bright-colored chintz at a window may give a destitute family the necessary cheer and courage to carry on.

Realizing this, government relief workers have attempted to aid depression victims to meet their clothing and housing problems in a way that would inject some beauty into drab environments. And the women to which such help has been given have responded with a resourcefulness worthy of their pioneer grandmothers.

"Women faced with necessity have again become artists and manufacturers," said Miss Claribel Nye, who for the last four months has acted as a volunteer in clothing and housing problems of the PERA under direction of Mrs. Ellen S. Woodward. Miss Nye, who is state leader of home economics extension work of Oregon State college, left yesterday for a field trip through several states before returning to her college post.

Needle-Achieve Wonders.
The home economics specialist pointed out that in many depression-ridden homes women had achieved miracles with their needles. Symphonies in cheesecloth, burlap and chintz, she said, had transformed many desolate dwellings into harmoniously cheerful homes, and children in such homes were frequently better dressed than formerly, through the skill and artistry of their mothers.

"The size of a family income does not insure adequate feeding and clothing of a family," Miss Nye said. "Many children of wealthy parents are undernourished, not only physically but psychologically, due to the social preoccupation of their mothers."

As Miss Nye spoke, her eyes lighted with approval on an exhibition of cleverly designed garments sent her as samples of work relief sewing rooms throughout the nation.

"Here are examples of skill and workmanship making the most of inexpensive materials," she said. "It is this, through the utilization of surplus in cotton and wool, that these gallant, economically pressed homemakers are contributing their bit toward recovery. They help the government by helping themselves on a self-respecting basis."

Opportunity for Service.
The relief situation, Miss Nye believes, has provided home economists their big opportunity for service. F
