TOWNSEND SCHEME HELD 'ILLUSION' BY ECONOMIC EXPERT

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26.—(AP)—The Townsend old age pension plan was termed "both illusory and dangerous" today in testimony by an administration advisor before the house ways and means committee. Douglas Brown, professor of economics at Princeton and an advisor to the president's committee on economic security, was the witness in behalf of the administration's social security program.

Representative Knutson (R., Minn.) asked his reaction to the Townsend $300-a-month pension plan for all persons over 60.

"That program is both illusory and dangerous," Brown replied. "It is wishful thinking from an economic standpoint—something you might wish could be done." "Our economic system is so delicately balanced that if this plan were put into effect it would destroy confidence and break down immediately, so that instead of a resumption of normal business activity we would have a continuing depression. "It is highly dangerous to have the old people believe such things as these are possible," Brown testified. "It would kill the goose that laid the golden egg."
