CARNIVAL GETS DILLINGER SHOW

MOORESVILLE, Ind. (UP)—Firmly believing in the "wooden gun" escape of his infamous son and that his name still carries a money-making power, John Dillinger, Sr., 70, will start a carnival tour next month.

The aged Morgan county dirt farmer, father of one of the most publicized modern criminals, will go in the carnival sideshows as a last effort to capitalize on his son's name.

It will be his second attempt at the stage. His first, a brief vaudeville tour, was a financial failure. It was made in an effort to obtain funeral expense funds after the outlaw was slain by federal agents in Chicago.

Now, it is a question of getting part of the fortune which he considers his from the nation-wide publicity given his notorious son. Then, too, he was prompted in his move to join the carnival after a fire destroyed his barn and most of his farm equipment recently.

The aged man still clings to the story Dillinger escaped from the Crown Point jail with the aid of a wooden gun, carved from parts of a washboard.

Last Quarter Century Sees More Changes Than Any Other Period — Huge Hats Favored in 1910

By H. L. PERCY

LONDON (UP)—Few things mark the passing of years as well as women's fashions.

One can almost tell the date by looking at old photographs of social events.

The last quarter of a century probably has seen more changes than any other period. It was the period of women's emancipation, and she shed her clothes as fast as she shed the conventions.

Fashion Cavalcade

From 1910 to 1935, the 25 years that King George has been on the throne, the cavalcade of fashion passes. Styles in this Silver Jubilee year are vastly different from the first year of his reign.

In 1910 women wore enormous hats, heavy with spreys, or ostrich plumes, or piled high with as many flowers as they would hold. Dresses were deeply embroidered or laden with lace. Imagination in those days rarely got beyond another plume, another scrap of lace.

"Lines" Hidden

Never did they attempt to remove any superfluous oddment which hid what today is called the "line." Slimming diets did not worry women then, but a head crowned with masses of intricately coiled shining hair was a possession any woman was envied.

The simplest item in the feminine wardrobe was a tennis frock, but the owner still coyly concealed her ankles beneath a long unwieldy skirt.

And one glimpse of the golfing kit of the period would make a modern girl shudder.

Necks in the daytime were concealed modestly beneath a high collar, usually uncomfortably boned, or if you were daring enough to lower this, you bowed to convention by wearing a wide ribbon around your throat.

Changed in 1913

But all this was changed by 1913. Women had taken to "pneumonia" blouses and low necks, in spite of grave misgivings voiced freely by old-fashioned people. They were wearing draped skirts, too.

Hats had changed very much for the worse. They were smaller, but incredibly unbecoming, while the massed plumes had given place to jaunty feathers sticking up like brushes.

The year 1915 provided the next definite fashion. Sacklike coats, untidy-looking frocks, hats with queer trimmings were all the rage then.

Then the war and its uniforms swept away all fashions until 1919. With the bobbed hair of wartime women wore curious little toques which were pulled down to the ears. Skirts were still ankle length and coats heavily trimmed with fur.

First Big Change

It was 1921, however, that brought the first big change of the post-war era. Waists began to slither down, although skirts were long. Clothes without any shape at all dripped with fur or embroidery.

This went on until 1924 when skirts became shorter and frocks more skimpy. Women cut their hair close to their heads, and the "Eton crop" came in. They wore thin, flesh-colored stockings in the daytime as well as the evening, and their waistline was stabilized well below the hips. The "chemise" frock arrived and women wore it almost unchanged during the "boom years."

In 1927 a mannequin at a dress show wore a suit which included something very much like bloomers and the predecessor of the 1935 shorts.

Youthful Women

In 1928 any woman, seen from the back, looked about 15 years old, so short were her skirts, so shapeless her frock, and so deep her cloche hat.

Nineteen-thirty saw the birth of the all-important "line." Slimming was an everyday topic. Slipper-length evening gowns, with more or less calf-length day dresses, were worn.

Pajama evening gowns and the cocktail dress were the efforts of 1932.

Finally, 1934 and 1935 have seen the influence of the smart continental styles of the Duchess of Kent.

AUTO INSPECTION LAWS GAIN FAVOR

WASHINGTON (UP) — Compulsory inspection of motor vehicle equipment soon may be authorized by 16 state legislatures, the American Automobile Association reported.

The Association said the movement for compulsory inspection "in the interest of highway safety" had gained momentum since 1935 sessions convened and that bills authorizing inspection by states, cities or towns had been introduced in 16 legislatures.

Thomas P. Henry, president of the A. A. A., said compulsory inspection laws already were in effect in nine states. Should the pending bills be enacted, about half of the United States would be in line.

"Properly conducted," Henry said, "there is no doubt at all that periodic inspection would tend to reduce the number of unsafe vehicles operating on the highways of the country."
