Flying Colonel Dons 'Lab' Gown To Co-Star in Drama of Science

By HOWARD W. BLANKSLEE (Associated Press Science Editor.) NEW YORK.—(AP)—The same quality of unerring workmanship which carried Col. Charles A. Lindbergh across the Atlantic straight to Paris has now taken him to the high places of scientific achievement.

Perfection in simplicity of mechanical design is the keynote of success in instruments he has been devising for the Rockefeller Institute here.

The latest of these—a mechanical heart and lungs—its details still a secret, have enabled Dr. Alexis Carrel, Nobel prize winner, to reach a goal sought for more than a century in medicine.

Contribution Great. This is a mechanical pump so perfect that no infection can get into it. With its aid, pumping artificial blood and air, Dr. Carrel keeps alive indefinitely whole vital organs removed from the body by surgery.

There is no overstatement of the importance of the flying colonel's contribution. Some of the greatest scientific achievements rest on perfection of mechanical apparatus—devised as a rule by scientists themselves.

Colonel Lindbergh's peculiar fitness for this branch of scientific work is shown in one of the earliest instruments he made for the Rockefeller Institute.
