Chapter One DARK YOUNG MAN

THE dark young man in the rough handsome overcoat moved in his seat. He did not like the girl sitting across from him. She reminded him too much of a girl he never again wanted to have anything to do with. The same slim hairline eyebrows, the same curved mascara-lengthened lashes, the same perfect grooming of her thin egg-shaped face and head and body, as if some gigantic nursemaid had just dressed her, doll-fashion, and dropped her in the parlor-car seat. She even had the same bright maroon nails. Then he gave an impatient shrug. If he was going to be annoyed every time a girl like that made a gesture of interest in him, he would have an irritating life. She was pattern, that was all; insolent high-voiced overgrown pattern; dozens of her on every stage, every train, every place you put your foot into. After all, what she had said was simple enough as he picked up her sliding magazine.

"Going through to New York, aren't you? Saw your ticket. So am I."

He had never seen her before; he never saw her again. But her reminding voice, her reminding quick vermilion mouth, her down-dipping thin black hair with a protruding up one side were enough.

"No, I have a stop-over at Broad Street Station," he said shortly.

"Of course—we have to change there," said the painted mouth, laughing provocatively at him. "Here, take my things."

HE wanted a walk. They arranged it; he would leave his suit cases at the hotel; if he liked the Lansing place he would telephone and have them sent over later.

She was all enthusiasm and bustle. He wished he hadn't started any on the stone step was dressed in a brown thing, shorter and straighter than the fashion. An allure of angry flaming charm radiated from her. She might have been, he thought fifteen. No pattern here, this child in a temper with life!

"Can you tell me the way to Grand Lane?" he asked her.

Her face flashed into unexpected bright courtesy.

"I'm going that way, I'll show you." She rose all in one little movement, and came down to him.

What she saw as he took over her burden and walked on beside her was a man of perhaps twenty-eight, with a strong harshly-cut face, heavy black hair, a tall loose racy body. He was dressed more carelessly yet better than the town boys she knew. She liked his voice, the beautiful depth and sure intonations as he spoke.

THEY went on in silence for ten minutes, perhaps. Finally, as they passed from an old street of straggling big old houses to a long narrow tree-set lane, she spoke curiously.

"What are the boughs for?" She spoke curiously. "My aunt wants them."
