Budd Southworth of Medford spent the week-end at the Matthews cabin on the discussion of communism and behaviorism, being illustrated by photographs recently taken by himself, that were as convincing as they were deplorable. Of Semitic blood himself and avowedly anti-Semitic in his convictions, yet he warned an Aryan audience that the greater proportion of communists were of the Jewish race.

He regretted the apparent indifference shown on the part of Protestant Christians toward this world menace and praised the more effective and united effort of the Catholic church against this foreign evil that is daily trenching its way more securely into the body politic of the United States.

On the screen and over the air, we do not get the pictures that reveal the backwash of society in Soviet Russia, but Mr. Patmont presented scenes of persecuted Christians, of the neglected, the dead and the dying of present-day Russia.

He impressed his audience with the fact that America, while suffering the worst depression in her history, is yet a happy, comfortable place in which to live, compared with Russia under the rule of Stalin and his Marxian principles of government. One scene of Russian youth, revealed a vast throng of well-fed and clothed children, lifting their clenched fists to heaven, as they formally denied the word of government. At the time, he stated that he was a man of science and not interested in socialism or communism. Mr. Patmont then threw upon the screen a picture of the third international with its great mass of representatives from all corners of the earth, and pointed out Albert Einstein, who showed
