THE WORLD WITH A FENCE

A New Novel by Marian Sims

Chapter One CAROL AT HOME

HE room, usually gay and serene, had today an electric quality, as if its atmosphere were charged with the currents of conflicting desires.

It was a charming room, recently grown shabby, filled with beautiful and unrelated objects that long association had blended into a harmonious whole. Bookshelves climbed the walls beside the fireplace.

The brilliant surface of a Duncan Phyfe secretary reflected a disreputable armchair, cherished for its vitiating comfort; a mellow Sarouk rubbed shoulders with a big taupe rug that had graduated years before from a department store.

The room reflected with uncanny accuracy the temperament of its inhabitants; the mixture of hardness and softness, of weakness and strength, of ugliness and beauty.

It was a hard room to leave. Carol thought as she stood on the hearth and felt it wrapping its tentacles about her. The room had shared half her twenty-six years, and it reminded her of that now, in the treacherous and unporting fashion of a woman who seeks to hold a familiar and unwilling lover.

It's no use, she told the room harshly; you've served your purpose. You belong to the whole family. I want one like you that belongs to me, and if I stay on here I'll never have it.

THAT left Jill, who was Pat's twin. Nobody, Carol thought gratefully, need waste sympathy on Jill. She knew what she wanted, and she knew that a straight line was usually the shortest distance between two points. (She even knew, Carol thought ruefully, when it wasn't!) She had rejected the sacrificial offer of a year or two at collect again, as if it were a disinterested bone. "Because I didn't apply for it, I love. Because it took this definite offer to push me over the edge. Because I'm the type that sits still and bays at the moon."

"I thought you didn't like teaching," Pat reminded her. "You tried it a year and quit."

"I don't really crave any sort of work," she confessed cheerfully. "I'd much rather be endowed, but not even colleges are having any luck at that now. Teaching's all right; it's just that—as the elevator boy told us about Westminster—it does take it out of you. In these parlous times it pays better than most things—and besides, it's all I can do. That's the beauty of these tony A-grade colleges."

Characteristically, Jill put her finger on the vital point. "What about Ashboro as a place to live? Won't you be swapping the devil for a witch?"

SHE would be, of course. She had visited Ashboro under the pleasantest of circumstances, and even invested with the glamour of strangeness it was still just another Georgia town. Heaven knew what it would be when she was an Out-of-Town Teacher. But—and this too she couldn't tell them—she wanted others, and he always would be. Pat was His Own Worst Enemy.

THAT left Jill, who was Pat's twin. Nobody, Carol thought gratefully, need waste sympathy on Jill. She knew what she wanted, and she knew that a straight line was usually the shortest distance between two points. (She even knew, Carol thought ruefully, when it wasn't!) She had rejected the sacrificial offer of a year or two at college and taken a business course instead, and now she had a fair salary in Meredith's only prosperous insurance office.

Some time within the next few years a personable and eligible man would cross her path, and Jill, sided by her own rose and gold beauty, would calmly annex him. Until then she liked a little town, she had two or three "boy friends," and she adored her home.

Milly was saying plaintively: "But, Carol, there's no real necessity for you to do it. Your rooms and meals cost practically nothing. We can manage like we've been doing."

Carol dragged her mind back to the issue. "That's just it; 'managing' is gradually getting me down. If I take this job it means that my clothes and food won't come out of the family exchequer and there'll be that much more for the rent of it. If you and Jill don't mind a stranger in
