RESIDENTS PACK IN READINESS TO DESERT VILLAGE

by fire Saturday night with a loss of nine lives.

From sections of southern Washington above Portland came reports that blazes there were generally controlled, although some in the Klakhat section—out of the fog belt—were burning freely.

District Fire Warden Keith Young estimated that 15,000 to 20,000 acres were burning in the Coos-Curry county area here. "Probably slightly less than 3,000 acres is virgin timber and the rest brush," he said. "The fires are not so large as others we've had but are more scattered and in more dangerous territory in regard to life and property."

Relief Starts

With Marshfield and her sister city, No. 10 Bend, and the inland towns of Coquille, Myrtle Point and Langlois apparently past the threat of a further extension of the Bandon disaster, relief officials headed by Brigadier General Thomas Riles, of the National Guard, conferred on a reconstruction program for the stricken logging city and selected a committee headed by J. W. McInturff, Marshfield city attorney, to report on a long-range program.

Fires which had encircled Coquille, Langlois and Myrtle Point were reported either controlled or past an emergency stage, largely because of the advancing banks of fog from the ocean, moistening the air, and rying down of winds, which whipped the flames into Bandon.

The dense fog gave firefighters nearly 5,000 strong an opportunity to control several of the most threatening blazes and the fire patrol officials here said that unless exceptionally high winds develop, the blaze which destroyed homes on the outskirts of Coquille will not menace other property with the exception of surrounding timber.

Fires Moving Slow

Several large fires are burning in the outside sections of the county but are advancing less than 50 feet an hour and new spot fires are being controlled. Flames still shot into the skies within five miles of Port Orford, cedar center of the west, and the Seaview ranch north of Port Orford was destroyed yesterday but the occupants escaped.

Roads were being opened in all sections except between Coquille and Bandon.

Vapor General George S. Stinson, commander of the ninth corps area, before entering a meeting to discuss reconstruction plans for Bandon said he never had seen a town more completely wiped out than the little logging center.

While relief heads mobilized plans for assistance of devastated citizens of Bandon, state and county police authorities renewed their efforts to trace the cause of the scattered fires. Persons on highways were being questioned and rumors circulated freely that firebugs had a hand in the disaster.

Incedentiarism Blamed

George Alexander, deputy supervisor of state police, said: "It looks like incedentiarism."

State police said a motorist turned over to them a mail made out of a rock and a woman's clothes soaked with kerosene, which he claimed, he saw thrown from a machine outside Marshfield.

CCC enrollees searched the ruins of Bandon for additional victims of the fire which roared through the village Saturday night, destroying between 350 and 400 buildings and leaving only a handful standing.

No new casualties were reported but a ninth victim remained unidentified. The others previously had been positively identified.

Fifty army tents had been erected at Bandon and the harried townspeople, who fled for their lives Saturday night, were slowly drifting back to a homeless of ruins by night it was expected 1000 of them would have returned and National Guardsmen said all could be housed temporarily in tents.

People Optimistic

Despite their loss, the people appeared optimistic and cheerful, encouraged by assurances of federal and state aid in rehabilitating themselves. One Bandon lumber mill announced plans to reopen tomorrow and others were expected to start operations by the end of the week. Altogether they employ 600 persons, and the mills were among the few structures which escaped the flames.

Bank officials announced plans to start business immediately and said the vault had been found intact in the destroyed bank building. They assured citizens of a liberal loan policy.

Coast guard cutters still stood by here and at Seaside to render any emergency aid.

ROTARY TOLD OF HART'S SEA TRIP

Members of the Medford Rotary club enjoyed a description of Floyd Hart's recent Honolulu voyage as a feature of the program today, held in the basement banquet hall of the Hotel Medford. Mr. Hart was a member of the party on one of the yachts entered in the race from the mainland to Hawaii and his experiences proved interesting to the Rotarians and guests at today's luncheon meeting.

In the brief business session today, the Medford Rotary club appropriated $25 for relief at Bandon and this sum will be sent immediately to the fire-stricken coast city.

KIWANIS DONATE $10 TO FIRE FUND

The Medford Kiwanis club, meeting in noon session yesterday for luncheon, voted $10 emergency fund for the Red Cross drive to aid fire victims in Bandon and other coast spots. George Frey, Red Cross head here, told the club members that the quota for Jackson county was to be $450.

Floyd Hart, who was one of a crew of six aboard the yacht Minerva, participating in the trans-Pacific yacht race which left Santa Monica July 4 for Honolulu, was the speaker. He entertained the members with stories of his adventure, outlining the trip the reception in the islands, and his return.

Sydney H. Kromer was a guest.
