

MUSEUM PUMPER TO PUT OUT FIRE IN DEMONSTRATION

chine on May 15, 1883, the Jacksonville department, organized in 1867, having decided that the best was none too good.

The pumper was manufactured in Seneca Falls, New York. It was shipped on the Queen of the Pacific which made the long and perilous voyage around the Horn at the southern tip of South America.

Ship Wrecked. The ship weathered the treacherous seas around the Horn, but perversely enough, was wrecked in the usually calm waters off the mouth of the Columbia river. It cost $221 to salvage the pumper, its original cost having been $800, records show.

From the north the pumper was shipped by freight. It was delivered in Jacksonville in September of 1883 and immediately put into service. At the first fire no screens were used and the pumper was made practically useless when a large stone was sucked into the hose line. Quite a hectic time was experienced until the rock was removed, Chief Wilson said.

To Take Movies. The old hand-pumper was utilized until 1929 when it was relegated to the department's museum to make room for more modern equipment. It is now valued highly as a relic of the past.

When it goes into action tomorrow the pumper will return to its former glory. A Universal news reel camera man will be here from Portland to record it on films that will be shown at theaters throughout the United States.
