$1 Month Graft Seen By Martin As Union's Goal

SALEM, July 14.—(AP)—Governor Martin charged today that the purpose of John L. Lewis' campaign to organize 2,000,000 state, county and municipal workers was "to collect $1 a month dues in a big graft."

The governor indicated he would fight the proposed union as hard as he has opposed the American Federation of Labor's attempted organization of Oregon state employees.

Lewis announced yesterday the proposed C.I.O. union, the federation of state, county and municipal employees, would be organized for collective bargaining purposes, with strikes and picketing prohibited.

President Roosevelt and Governor Martin have agreed that no government can bargain with its employees because they are responsible to congress or the legislature.

JULIUS L. MEIER, EX-GOVERNOR, IS TAKEN BY DEATH

Meier, who had founded in 1857 the store upon which the family fortune was built.

He studied law at the University of Oregon, graduating in 1895. As a college graduate he began the lifelong friendship which George Joseph carried to the grave, becoming Joseph's partner, a business he carried on until his father's death four years later, when he stepped into management of the rapidly growing department store.

It was only natural that Joseph should become attorney for the store and until his death in 1930, Joseph and Meier were intimate business associates.

Although Meier never entered politics until Joseph's sudden death, he was widely known over Oregon, one of his earliest achievements being the calling of a meeting of taxpayers in 1912 which fathered the development of the scenic Columbia River highway. Meier was the first president of the association which pushed forward that project.

Kept Highway Interest

His interest in the highway continued through his life and he chose for his home a site overlooking the wonders of the Columbia gorge and it was there he died.

He played a part in air commerce development in the northwest and led the organization of northwest industrialists to obtain tariff hearings. Although known chiefly as a department store owner, Meier was a banker, heading the American National bank, which later was sold to the First National bank of Portland.

Meier's historic campaign for the governorship was waged against two prominent Oregon politicians, Phil Metcham, whom the Republican party chose as Joseph's successor, and Ed Bailey, at the time Democratic state senator. So successful was his fight that Meier entered office with what at that time, 1930, was the largest majority ever given a candidate for the governorship, 80,000.

Rapped High Court

When the time came for his inauguration, Meier, after first refusing to take his oath from the chief justice, proceeded, while the entire court sat at the ceremonies within close earshot, to make part of his inauguration speech a criticism of the court that its disbarment of Joseph was a "stain and a disgrace" upon the court's record.

In the long memories of veterans of Oregon politics, it was probably the most dramatic moment of its kind in state history, and as Meier turned from the rostrum he went to deal with a legislature, the majority of which was in sympathy with his program.

The course he marked for the legislature was the same as Joseph envisioned. He recommended that the public service commission be abolished and a department of public utilities created. The legislature acted accordingly.

Repeal of the certificate of necessity and convenience act was demanded and obtained. Municipalities should be given the right of home rule in dealing with utility regulations and that statute was enacted. The new governor called for creation of a hydro-electric commission and it was set up.

Consolidation Favored

He recommended that municipalities be given preference over private groups in application for power development and that was seconded. He backed consolidation of state agencies and was given the department of agriculture and the state police. Likewise his recommendation for election of judges on a non-partisan basis was enacted and at his instance the market road millage tax was repealed.

Cost of maintenance of state wards in insane hospitals was urged as a county expense and the legislature agreed and he obtained continuation of the income and intangible tax laws.

The one bitter fight came over his recommendation to make the members of the port of Portland commission appointive by the governor. In this he was defeated, the commissioners being made elective but in 1935 the legislature, under the present Martin administration, made them appointive.

Historians record that probably no legislature marched so straightly down the lines charted for it by a governor as did that first legislature in the Meier administration and few, if any, placed upon the statute books laws of such far-reaching scope.
