

Postal Inspector Makes Photo of Arctic Circle

A man was in Medford today who said he has a photograph of the Arctic circle.

School books may say that the Arctic circle is an imaginary line, but Judge Wood, postoffice inspector, avers he has a photo of it.

This is how it happened: At a certain place in Alaska a reindeer fence exactly parallels the Arctic circle for 35 or 40 miles. From an airplane the fence looks like a thin white line. When he was on a postoffice inspection trip in Alaska recently, Mr. Wood photographed the fence from a plane. Now, he declares, he has a photo of the Arctic circle, bringing the imaginary line into actuality.

During his recent inspection trip to the Arctic territory, Mr. Wood covered about 41,000 miles, mostly by air. He left Seattle on June 26 and was back on September 2.

Alaska's problem has been transportation and that has now been solved by aviation, Mr. Wood said. Plane schedules now cover the territory and the service is more efficient than in continental United States, he asserted.

As an example of the improved transportation facilities, Mr. Wood cited a trip he made from Fairbanks to Nome, a distance of about 800 miles. By steamer on the Yukon the trip used to require 21 days. Mr. Wood said he left Fairbanks one day by plane at 7 a. m., made eight stops, inspected seven postoffices and had supper in Nome.
