Deanna Durbin In Show Filled With Music and Paths

Columns have been written in praise of the Deanna Durbin picture, "Mad About Music," which opened its local run yesterday at the New Craterian theatre. And, after seeing it, one can readily understand why.

Only rarely do motion picture productions reach the heights so rich in essentials as "Mad About Music." But then again, only rarely does the world receive such a beautiful gift as the charming Deanna. And it is to Deanna that one must give the credit.

The story is set in a Swiss girl's school, where fatherless Deanna, long separated from the glamorous Hollywood star mother, creates a fictitious father for herself.

Much to his own amazement, and his valet, Herbert Marshall, is selected by Deanna to be her make-believe father. Embarrassed when she tells him she plays the part perfectly, which not only convinces the doubting school girls, but the teachers too, and eventually he finds his reward when he meets Deanna's mother, played by Gail Patrick.

There's one thing more, Deanna, in telling her big fib to the other girls, always keeps her fingers crossed. That's her way of showing she doesn't really mean it. But it certainly isn't necessary to cross one's fingers in recommending "Mad About Music" to anyone. It's that kind of picture.
