City Folk Suffer from Malnutrition Is Expert's Claim

PORTLAND, April 21.—(AP)—Dr. B. W. Fairbanks, nutrition chemist at the University of Illinois said in an interview yesterday that rich persons and city dwellers were more likely to suffer from malnutrition than farmers and poorer folk.

He said numerous natural foods eaten by rural dwellers kept them as healthy as in pioneer hog-and-hominy days.

"But the people who are enjoying our industrial civilization are not doing so well," he added. "City dwellers have more money to cater to the idiosyncrasies of their palates, therefore they are more apt to have malnutrition than people in rural sections."

"The city people are eating enough but their food is not well balanced."
