Irene Dunne in Craterian Comedy

Irene Dunne, Guy Kibbee and Alice Brady are a happy triumvirate (despite the agonized expression on Kibbee's face) in "The Joy of Living," which co-stars Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., with the popular Irene, opening a three-day run Sunday at the Craterian theater. Also featured in the cast are Eric Blora, Lucille Ball and Warren Hymer. Irene Dunne plays the musical comedy star who, in spite of her huge income, is always in debt as a result of her relatives' extravagances, and never finds time to really enjoy herself, while Doug Jr. is the unconventional adventurer who yearns to establish her as the queen of his South Sea island, but first insists upon teaching her the proper method of "letting her hair down" and enjoying life to the hilt.

PREFERS WRITING TO MOVIE ACTING

HOLLYWOOD (AP)—They wanted her to act, but Eleanor Harris wanted to write.
Two years out of college, she still gets offers of screen tests from movie talent scouts, but she sticks to her desk—in one of the larger studios where her name is on the scenarists' list.
Now she's being given credit, along with veterans Sylvia Levin, Ernest Pascal and Edwin Blum, for the screen-writing job on Stevenson's "Kidnapped."
Miss Harris herself figured, in 1935, in a "kidnaping" case. She was abducted—after being chosen queen of the annual Masque ball at Stanford university—by students from a rival university.

American Artists Advised To Forego Study in Paris

PARIS (UP)—Paris is no longer a school for American artists because it can teach them nothing," declared Homer Saint-Gaudens, director of the Carnegie Institute Fine Arts, before he sailed for America.
He admitted here that he had not included a single American painter in Paris in the collection of 269 paintings which he gathered for the annual Carnegie Institute International exhibition opening in Pittsburgh, October 13.
"Back in the 'good old days' lived outstanding American artist every learned and painted in Paris. Today it is to his advantage to stay home. The American painter is distinctly free, white and 21. He is full of ideas and there is nothing he can learn in Europe," Saint-Gaudens said with no hesitancy.
After searching 11 European nations for the European collection, Saint-Gaudens is pleasantly anticipating "a good fight." He says that his fondest hope is that the Carnegie award jury will "blow the roof off" as it did last year when it selected Brock's modern American works and Waugh's marine painting for the fourth consecutive year.
To promote the fight, and the ensuing interest in art, the Carnegie Fine Arts department has picked extremists for its 1938 jury of four. Two academicians, Sidney Lee and Charles Hopkins, will fight it out with Frieze, modern French painter of the Bonnard school, and John Carroll, painter of fanciful female figures. Lee is treasurer and vice president of the Royal Academy, the first Royal Academy member to serve on a Carnegie art jury. Hopkins is a New England portrait painter.
Hungary will be represented in the show for the first time. Spain, despite its war, is rolling its canvases and "smuggling" them out of Madrid and Barcelona. Russia no longer is included in the exhibition because the paintings shown by its government in the past have smacked too much of propaganda. Spanish artists, on the contrary, refuse to combine their political and esthetic sympathies.
Saint-Gaudens regarded as "dynamite" any statement he might make about the WPA art project in America.
"The danger of the American government's supporting painting to too great an extent is the danger of art becoming a political tool," he said. "The less politics there is in painting, the better the painting," he warned. "All painting is a luxury supported by wealth of the social order. Italy's government supports the top 15 artists; the American government is supporting the lowest-ranking artists. Germany has tried results speak for themselves. France, despite its increasing mixture of politics with painting, is at least keeping the arts alive and maintaining to regiment the aesthetic, and the their continuity."
