Defining Labor's Rights

PERHAPS labor conditions will have to get worse before they get better. If so the United States will merely follow in the footsteps of Great Britain. For Great Britain passed four labor statutes in 40 years...

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT a few days ago announced he plans to send a mission to England this summer, to study this Trades Disputes Act, and report to him precisely how it is being administered...

John L. Lewis doesn't like the idea. He intimates that any move on the part of the government to follow in the footsteps of Great Britain will be regarded by him and his organization as an "unfriendly act."

If so the people will find, the Trades Disputes Act, makes all GENERAL strikes illegal. It renders strikers criminally liable if their actions threaten a community with serious injury or inconvenience.

It imposes certain restrictions upon the political activities of trade unions, and requires all unions to report their political funds to the Registrar of Friendly Societies and through that medium, to the public.

The general philosophy of the Act is that trade unions must accept obligations imposed by law, if they are to benefit from protections bestowed by law, and that in all disputes between capital and labor, the public welfare must be held paramount.

THE measure is not anti-labor, however. It supports labor's right to strike and to bargain collectively. It renders the "lock-out" as illegal as the general strike, and protects the workman from intimidation, on the part of the employer, as well as on the part of the union "boss."

But it does most decidedly clear the labor atmosphere. It shows what are labor's legitimate rights, the legitimate rights of capital, and more important than either, what are the rights of the long-suffering public.

IT is to be hoped this presidential commission IS sent to England and does report its findings to the American people, and to the congress of the United States.

As a result this country might enjoy the benefit of England's experience, without suffering as England suffered, to the tune of two and a half billion dollars, an increase of half a million to the unemployed list, and for several weeks, virtual commercial and industrial paralysis.

The Portland Strike

THIS hotel strike in Portland is a comparatively small affair, but if it develops as a similar strike in San Francisco did a year ago it will cost the community hundreds of thousands of dollars, and benefit exactly no one.

What are the hotel employees striking for anyway? As was the case in San Francisco no one seems to know. One side says one thing. Another says something else. Meanwhile a federal mediator runs around like a cat chasing its tail, from one side to the other, in a vain effort to find out.

But they didn't. And as a result everyone suffers. The employees lose their pay, and perhaps their jobs; the hotels lose prestige and patronage; the community, particularly the retail merchants lose business.

In England of course, such a strike would never have been called. For the Trade Disputes Act prevents a sympathetic strike, and the hotel employees would have known, that without assistance from their fellow unionists, they would be beaten on such an issue, before they got a start.

BUT even more important than the provisions of the act itself, would be the character of public opinion over there. Since that general strike of a decade ago, the strike has come to be regarded in England, as it should always be regarded, as a measure of last resort.

Nothing to be entered into lightly or casually. But to be employed only when the issue is of genuine importance, and all other measures of reaching an understanding have failed.

As a result there would be no thought of ordering a walkout of this sort in an English metropolis, for there would be utterly no popular support for it, and therefore, it would be doomed at the start.

We can think of nothing that would do more to clear the atmosphere in this country, and advance peace and harmony between labor and capital, than a similar attitude toward the unwarranted strike, on the part of the American people.

ACID STOMACH AND THAT GAS During digestion or in many instances when hunger, appetite or desire for food is stimulated by the sight, odor or even the thought of food of which one is particularly fond, the gastric juice is acid. The acid in gastric juice is hydrochloric (muratic) acid.

If the secretion of acid is deficient, a h. digestion of food in the stomach is retarded and the progress of the meal thru the stomach and on into the intestine is delayed too. The acidity of hypochlorhydria is usually present in anemia, chronic gastritis, in persons with vitamin deficiency and in some cases of cancer of the stomach.

If the gastric juice is too acid, hyperchlorhydria, "acid stomach," the digesting food is likely to be hurried through the stomach and on into the intestine before the normal digestion in the stomach is completed. Hyperchlorhydria occurs with gastric or duodenal ulcer, gallstones, in excessive smokers and in some cases of "neurasthenia" or overirritability or abnormally sensitive reaction to everyday emotional stimuli.

When the hydrochloric acid is diminished or absent, proteina are badly digested, and long retention of the foods in the stomach leads to fermentation (of starches or sugars) with formation of lactic acid and other acids such as butyric, as well as gases.

"Heartburn" or a painful sensation felt in the region of the esophagus, behind the breastbone, is due to regurgitation of even normal gastric juice into the esophagus or gullet; or to regurgitation of hyperacid stomach contents. Pain caused by acid where acid should not be. "Waterbrash" is the burning and irritation of the throat by normally acid or hyperacid fluid regurgitated from the stomach.

Eruption of gas, belching, may occur in any case of hypochlorhydria or hyperacid stomach. In some of the most pronounced instances of belching, however, there is nothing the matter with the stomach, just an "Incompetent" Troubled for ten years with bleeding from rectum. They say she is the most photographed girl in the Islands. . . . Ray Kinney told me about her last year. . . . And then he went back to Honolulu to build his orchestra and arrange for the presentation of old gourd dances and hulas and fine tropic entertainment. . . . When he returned Pualani was with him, not placed in water they will die. And, seeing her, you will have hailed the first passing water and inquired her name.

Let me beat the water to it. Let me tell you her name. It is Pualani, which in the land beyond old Diamond Head, means "Flower of Heaven."

After more than my rightful share of hours whittled away in this atmosphere of hurricanes and tropic howlers I am reminded of a coincidence in realism which first touched Fredrick March some years ago when he returned Pualani was with him, not placed in water they will die. And, seeing her, you will have hailed the first passing water and inquired her name.

And that's what I mean. If things keep on the way they have been The Hawaiians will have to come to New York for their native atmosphere. Instead of New Yorkers boarding planes and ships for the Pacific, indeed, somebody after a visit to Honolulu, may very well track postmaster general from the president. Big Jim pooh-poohs the whole business, but the disagreement is there all the same. The president has gone here-hunting, and big Jim is not a heresy hunter.

To be sure, the defeat of Senator Millard F. Tydings, of Maryland, would give him some pleasure, and he would not weep to see "Cotton Ed" Smith beaten in South Carolina. But he undoubtedly deplors the president's use of the primaries for a wholesale party purge. He was on the opposite side from the president in Oregon and Iowa, and still opposes the forays against Senator Walter F. George in Georgia and Senator Alva B. Adams in Colorado. To friends on Capitol Hill, he has described them as saddy and uselessly disruptive of party unity.

Thus far, the president has been content to go his own way and let Big Jim go his. There has never yet been an unpleasant word between them. Since Parley and Secretary Wallace tacitly opposed his candidate in Iowa, however, the president is said to have decided to make all his subordinates sing a single tune.

It's fortunate, therefore, that a long-planned and needed vacation in Alaska and the northwest will keep Big Jim out of Washington in primary time. Thus, unpleasant words will be avoided, and he can return to pick up the pieces and put over the Democratic candidates, whoever they may be. These tasks are more congenial to him than any others. He'd rather make peace between factions to elect a Democratic dog-catcher than win a thousand bets on the races.

Big Jim is just the sort of fellow his name suggests. A large, pink-faced man of pleasant aspect and manners. He is a natural idol for rank and file party workers. Alone among the eminent officials of the New Deal, he knows the local party politicians, their habits, appetites and first names. For this reason, some men around the president fear him and his influence.

He lives simply, does not drink or smoke, and goes out little. His days are dedicated to his party. Unhappily, his devotion to his party is likely to cause his disagreement with the president to recur after the fall elections. Then it will be time to think of 1940, and each man thinks in a very different way. Big Jim would hold all the elements in the Democracy together with a middle-of-the-road candidate. The president would purge the party, bring in new and more radical blood, and unite it on an aggressively new dealish platform with an aggressively new dealish leader.

The two men have been a team for many years. They are still a team, but, unless one or the other changes his mind, the time must come when the team will suffer the fate of most teams.

Comment on the Day's News

By FRANK JENKINS

TEN Democratic senators, including Roosevelt supporters as well as critics, propose appointment of a three-man senatorial committee to investigate "any charges of politics in connection with relief which might arise in the course of the 1938 election campaign."

NOTE, please, that the proposal is put forth on the day following the Iowa primary election, in which Relief Administrator Hopkins FAILED so disastrously in his efforts to play politics.

When you do something you're ashamed of and it DOESN'T WORK, you're pretty apt to make a pious resolution NOT TO DO IT AGAIN.

ANYBODY who plays politics (or TRIES to) with the needs of hungry people OUGHT to be ashamed of it—whether it works or not. And anybody who is CAUGHT playing politics with relief ought to be run out of the country at the end of a pitchfork.

HOPKINS, incidentally, gave out a statement to the reporters to the effect that Gillette's renomination in the Iowa primary, in spite of the WPA is NOT playing politics.

That is to say, if you don't get away with it you're honest, and can't be blamed for TRYING.

BUT let's quit kidding and talk sense for a moment. For five years we've been experimenting with taking it away from those who have and giving it to those who haven't. The NET RESULT is millions of unemployed and other millions on the borderline of unemployment because of the impending failure of industry and business under the take-and-give system.

THESE unemployed millions, in this writer's judgment, are pitiful unfortunates who are compelled to subsist on the mere pittance of relief, which is just enough to keep body and soul together, instead of earning the good wages they used to earn before government became the ENEMY OF BUSINESS.

The politicians who brought these poor unfortunates to their present sad state do not hesitate to TRADE ON THEIR MISFORTUNE by using them as pawns in the game of politics.

Political morals can fall no lower than that.
