Beginning An Explosive Serial Of The French Riviera

"My dear young lady, neither of us know you. And it's not a case of defective memory, for you're much too pretty to forget."

THE CLOUDED MOON By MAX SALT MARSH

Chapter One A Riviera Blonde

"ARCHIE," said Hugo Stern suddenly, "a blonde over there has her eye on you." I sighed. "Do you mind," I asked patiently, "being a trifle more explicit? This place is full of blondes." "The one I mean is sitting thirty degrees right, at the corner table. Don't look round. She may be some old flame you'd rather not rekindle, or she may merely have a weakness for the Tarzan type of male, but she's definitely got her eye on you, and if you see it she'll take it as an invitation." "Not when she gets a clear sight of my face," I retorted, and I turned, ignoring his protest, balancing my gin fizz precariously on the arm of my chair and surveying the landscape. It was even as I had said. Far as the eye could reach, the open air terrace of the Carlton was peopled with nothing but blondes, ranging from the shy fairness of Scandinavia, through varying synthetic shades of peroxide, to the ripe coral-color of the Germans. "Men were there too, swarthy as nature or sun-tan had made them and dressed for the most part in the blue cotton shirt and trousers of the fishermen whose native coast they had invaded, but they were merely the necessary background to the ladies beyond that lay the blue Mediterranean, crowned with the shimmering, hazy vault of the midday August sky. The blonde in question was sitting alone, at a small table in the shadow of a clipped bay tree, sipping a pinkish, frothy drink from tall glass; a slender, long-limbed creature, dressed in white shorts and shirt, with a crimson sash folded about her slim waist, and a red chiffon handkerchief knotted on her crisp golden curls. The effect of her was of youth and grace and ease—only her eyes, dark and brooding, gave the lie to the picture; and those eyes, as Hugo had said, were fixed intently on me. As I caught her gaze she smiled suddenly, with a flash of white teeth, and lifted a hand in greeting; but I looked away hurriedly. I was in Cannes for a bare couple of days, and that only to see Hugo, and I had no mind for any feminine entanglements that would cut short my time with him. "I don't know her," I assured him, but he shook his head mournfully. "You shouldn't have looked her way. There you are, she's coming over now and you'll find yourself stung for a cocktail and lunch before you know where you are. I know these Riviera blondes." "Not lunch," I retorted, "but she can have her cocktail. She may be a gold-digger," I added thoughtfully, "but she's extraordinarily easy to look at." "She shook his head again. "Cut out the cocktail too," he said. "But she may be easy to look at, but I haven't seen you for two years and why should I lose my pleasure to give a girl a free drink? You leave me to handle her." "Hard-hearted!" I felt that he was being unnecessarily hard-hearted, but I knew well, at the same time, that he had plenty of excuse.
