Joaquin Murrieta. Drawn to California in 1849 by tales of easy money to be found in the gold fields, Joaquin Murrieta, a native of Sonora, Mexico, was persecuted by rough white miners into becoming one of the west's most colorful outlaws.

Murrieta swore vengeance against the Americans and for more than two years ranged over a large part of the state, killing and robbing with appalling regularity.

In 1853 Murrieta, with a comrade, Three-Fingered Jack, and two other desperadoes, robbed and killed the members of a schooner party winding through the tule slough near Stockton, bound for San Francisco with $20,000 in gold taken from the mines.

After the deed, Murrieta fired the ship. Citizens of Stockton, then a boom town of 20,000, formed posses and scoured the area for Murrieta and Three-Fingered Jack—their two comrades having been killed in the raid.

In the town square of Stockton, then the metropolis of San Joaquin valley, a poster read: "$5,000 REWARD! Offered by the Citizens of Stockton to anyone who Delivers to the Authorities JOAQUIN MURRIETA DEAD OR ALIVE."
