THE CLOUDED MOON By MAX SALT MARSH

The Characters
Hugo Stern, handsome author, living on the French Riviera, Archie Lumsden, my self, Hugo's friend.

Chapter Two
An Unpleasant Chilly
I FELT a queer little chill run down my spine. I swung around in my chair, staring at the surrounding tables, but no one seemed to be taking the slightest interest in our movements.

His costume alone would have marked him out even from that vari-colored throng, for he wore a pair of rust-red, fisherman's trousers, bell-bottomed over his bare and bony ankles, a gray-blue shirt, opened to show a neck as thin and elongated as a Christmas turkey's, and over that a yellow coat of the local peasant linen.

THE cartoonist shrugged. "It is true, but for me, alas, there is no choice. These people are my material, the stuff that satire is made of, and every so often I must sit here, alone at my little table, watching them and replenishing my store. But you, my dear Hugo, a little of this spurious gaiety would not hurt you. You will, however, be so good as to convey my compliments to our little Eve."

THE cartoonist shrugged. "It is true, but for me, alas, there is no choice. These people are my material, the stuff that satire is made of, and every so often I must sit here, alone at my little table, watching them and replenishing my store. But you, my dear Hugo, a little of this spurious gaiety would not hurt you. You will, however, be so good as to convey my compliments to our little Eve."

THE cartoonist shrugged. "It is true, but for me, alas, there is no choice. These people are my material, the stuff that satire is made of, and every so often I must sit here, alone at my little table, watching them and replenishing my store. But you, my dear Hugo, a little of this spurious gaiety would not hurt you. You will, however, be so good as to convey my compliments to our little Eve."

I had never seen a fellow creature who attracted me less than this one.

completely diverted from our late quest. "The things you see when you haven't got your gull? I've struck a lot of peculiar specimens in my time, but none as peculiar as that."

Hugo's glance followed mine and, as it came to rest on the strange figure his nose wrinkled as if he saw something distasteful. "Recalling the word," he answered dryly. "And the more you see of that gentleman the more peculiar you'll find him, but he's a celebrity all the same. That, my country cousin, is a very famous man, no less than the great René Geiss himself."

"Never heard of him," I retorted. "You wouldn't—under his own name; but if you haven't heard of Sherr, the cartoonist, you're more of an ignoramus than I took you for."

"I had another look at the man. It was true that I had heard of Sherr, and as it happened, I was fairly familiar with his drawings, which I viewed with a kind of disgusted admiration. He was, I suppose, the most brilliant and vitriolic cartoonist of the day. He delighted, it seemed, in depicting animals in the garb of humans, but most of all he seemed to prefer the goat, and now, as I stared at him with a lively curiosity, I thought I saw the reason why."

"Like a goat himself," I said. "All you've got to do is to put horns and a beard on him."

Hugo grinned. "More than that," he said. "His name though he's a Frenchman born, he is the German equivalent of the French equivalent as his pen-name. Oh, he realizes the likeness well enough himself."

He broke off abruptly and groaned. "We've done it," he said. "Our naive interest was too marked. He's coming over now. It was true. The basilisk stare had shifted from the sea and focused itself on us, and the man himself, unfolding his bony height and standing up, was stroiling towards our table glass in hand. He halted beside Hugo's chair, gazing down at us with those colorless, protuberant eyes.

"I do not intrude," he asked politely, in a toneless voice that made me think of the wind through a reed. "I am so glad, my dear Hugo, to see you again! You become a hermit."

He gave a sudden cackle of laughter, though his face showed no merriment, and sat down, pushing back the chair to accommodate his long legs. I noticed that he seemed to have his thick white skin mottled with freckles, which gave him a curiously unwholesome appearance. His eyes, too, at close quarters, were more than a few like those of the goat he resembled; bluish white pebbles they seemed, with hardly a trace of pupil. All together I had never seen a fellow-creature that attracted me less, but I tried to show some cordiality as we were introduced.

He bowed graciously. "A friend of my dear Hugo's must be a friend of mine," he informed me. "But tell me, my loved one," he added, turning to Hugo, "how is it that I find you here today, you who disdain so much these haunts of pleasure?"

I might ask the same question of you," he retorted. "The last time I saw you, you told me you were fed up with the sight of so much cheap sophistication."

"The Little Eve"
THE cartoonist shrugged. "It is true, but for me, alas, there is no choice. These people are my material, the stuff that satire is made of, and every so often I must sit here, alone at my little table, watching them and replenishing my store. But you, my dear Hugo, a little of this spurious gaiety would not hurt you. You will, however, be so good as to convey my compliments to our little Eve."

"And what the dickens," said he, gloomily, "are we going to say to Ada? I told her we'd meet her at the flower-market at twelve."

At the present moment Ada's short, stout figure was encased in a pair of men's gray flannel trousers and a cricket shirt that I suspected had once belonged to Hugo. In one hand she carried a market basket, on top of which perched precariously a bunch of leeks, a lettuce, and an outside eggplant.

"Well," she demanded, ominously quiet, "what's the excuse this time?"

"It's all my fault," I said hurriedly, answering Hugo's mute appeal. "I got picked up, as a matter of fact, by one of your local blondes, and only Hugo's presence of mind extricated me intact, and then, as soon as she had removed herself, along blew a man who has a 'rudge against dark women."

"It was Geiss," Hugo explained to his sister.

"Geiss," she said. "Thank Heaven I missed him. I can't stand that man."

As we strolled towards the car, I saw, sitting at a table under the yellow awning of a little cafe across the road, with the name "Bar Alacian" in gold letters above it, the girl in crimson and white.

"There she is," I said to Ada, as we halted beside the car. "There's our blonde. What do you think of her?"

The girl was sitting with lowered eyes, intent on some modest meal, and Ada gave her a quick, scrutinizing glance. "She's very pretty," she said wistfully and with no hint of jealousy, and then added inconspicuously: "Life must be very easy for women with faces like that."

"She didn't strike me as finding it particularly easy," I said. Hugo dropped into the driving-seat and started the engine.

"I suppose," I said, settling myself beside him, "his stroke was that it might have been the sight of your friend Geiss that scared her off?"

"Don't call him my friend," he retorted with a hint of irritation as the big car purred forward. "Naturally it struck me; in fact, it seemed obvious."

"At least," I said, wondering vaguely why the thought of the girl was so haunting me, "he told us something about her. Her name is Eve, and for some reason she'll be at Palm Beach tonight. What, by the way, is Palm Beach?"

"It happens to be the most exclusive of the local night resorts," said Hugo. "We shall never know the truth about our little Eve, for we are most definitely not going to Palm Beach."

Guest Flees Party
CORVALLIS, Mont. (UP)—When members of the Christian Endeavor society came to the home of Bruce Bryson to celebrate his 18th birthday, Bruce took to the roof of the barn and remained there until the party was over and all of the guests had gone home. It was his idea of avoiding a birthday spanking.
